

BS2705

,R.64.4

Paul's Joy in Christ

Studies in Philippians

By

A. T. ROBERTSON, M.A., D.D., LL.D.

Professor of New Testament Interpretation in Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.

"To me to Live is Christ"

NEW YORK	CHICAGO	TORONTO
Fleming	H. Revell	Company
LONDON	AND	EDINBURGH

Copyright, 1917, by
FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY

New York: 158 Fifth Avenue
Chicago: 17 North Wabash Ave.
Toronto: 25 Richmond Street, W.
London: 21 Paternoster Square
Edinburgh: 100 Princes Street

To

J. M. Robertson

my brother who made it possible for me to be a preacher

Preface

THESE lectures were first prepared as expository talks from the Greek text for the Northfield Conference for Christian workers in August, 1913. They were delivered in Sage Chapel and their publication was requested by the hearers. The addresses have since been repeated at Winona Lake, Indiana, Columbus, Ohio, Virginia Beach, Moody Bible Institute, and to various other assemblies and churches. The Greek text is kept in foot-notes so that the average man can read the book with comfort without a knowledge of Greek. The volume is essentially popular in style and purpose, while the latest researches of modern scholarship are utilized for the illustration of this noble Epistle. Nowhere is the tender side of Paul's nature better shown than here, his delicacy, his courtesy, his elevation of feeling, his independence, his mysticism, his spiritual passion. My book is not so much a technical commentary, though it covers all the Epistle, as an interpretation adapted to modern needs on the part of all teachers, preachers and students of the New Testament. Nowhere does Paul have more "charm," to use Ramsay's phrase, than in Philippians. Nowhere is he more vital and more powerful. Paul was not merely a man of supreme genius and high culture, but one who let himself go completely in spiritual abandonment to the love and life of Jesus. It is small wonder that the hypercritical spirit seeks to discount him as a paranoiac or a Pharisaic bungler who distorted the message of Jesus. Such modern critics fail to understand Paul because of failure to know Jesus as Paul knew Him by rich experience of heart and soul. I confess to a feeling of reverent hesitation as I venture to enter afresh this Holy of Holies of Paul's Life in Christ. Here we see in clear outline, not only Paul's Joy in Life, but his Joy in Death, a message sorely needed by many stricken hearts during these dreadful days of war. Paul was able to see the Face of Christ in Death since Death brought Christ in all His fullness.¹

A. T. R.

Louisville, Ky.

¹ Once more, as I read the proof of this page, I am called upon to find Christ in Death, in the going of my young daughter, Charlotte, who loved Jesus utterly.

Contents

I.	THE BRIEF SALUTATION	11
	(Philippians 1 : 1-2.)
II.	JOY IN PRAYER	56
	(1 : 3-11.)
III.	GOOD OUT OF ILL	73
	(1 : 12-20.)
IV.	JOY IN DEATH AS WELL AS IN LIFE	92
	(1 : 21-30.)
V.	PAUL'S FULL CUP	110
	(2 : 1-11.)
VI.	REALIZING GOD'S PLAN IN LIFE	141
	(2 : 12-18.)
VII.	FELLOWSHIP	158
	(2 : 19-30.)
VIII.	THE HOLY QUEST	174
	(3 : 1-14.)
IX.	FOLLOWING THE ROAD	204
	(3 : 15-21.)
X.	THE GARRISON OF PEACE	225
	(4 : 1-9.)
XI.	THE SECRET OF HAPPINESS	245
	(4 : 10-23.)

I

THE BRIEF SALUTATION

(Philippians 1 : 1-2.)

THE formula for greeting in Paul's Epistles is now very familiar to all students of the Greek papyri. Here the technical word for greeting,¹ so common in the papyri and seen in James 1 : 1, is absent. But it is implied, of course, and is simply taken for granted by Paul. The full formula is to "say greeting,"² like our vernacular "say howdy," as we find it in 2 John 10, "give him no greeting,"³ and 11, "that giveth him greeting."⁴ This most familiar of all Paul's Epistles (or Letters, as Deissmann⁵ insists on calling them all) is very simple and direct in the salutation. The outstanding facts of the situation come promptly before us.

1. Paul the Author.

No one of Paul's Epistles stands upon firmer ground than this one, in spite of Baur's vigorous attacks upon its genuineness. His arguments have been completely answered and McGiffert⁶ sums the

¹ χαίρειν. ² λέγειν χαίρειν. ³ χαίρειν αὐτῷ μὴ λέγετε.

⁴ ὁ λέγων αὐτῷ χαίρειν.

⁵ "Light From the Ancient East," p. 225.

⁶ "The Apostolic Age," p. 393.

matter up by saying: "It is simply inconceivable that any one else would or could have produced in his name a letter in which no doctrinal or ecclesiastical motive can be discovered, and in which the personal element so largely predominates and the character of the man and of the apostle is revealed with so great vividness and fidelity." Von Soden¹ denies the genuineness of Ephesians and the Pastoral Epistles, but he stoutly defends Philippians: "We are treading upon very sacred ground as we read this epistle. It is without doubt the last from St. Paul's hand." The ground is holy beyond a doubt, but not because this is the last of Paul's Epistles. Moffatt² waves aside Baur's criticisms as to alleged imitation, anachronisms, gnostic controversies, and doctrinal discrepancies and argues also for the unity and integrity of the Epistle in spite of Polycarp's use of the plural³ in referring to Paul's Epistle which, like the Latin litteræ, can be used of a single epistle. The somewhat broken and disconnected style of Philippians is due rather to the incidental character of the letter and its personal nature. It is in no sense a formal treatise and has no announced theme as in Romans 1:17. Critics who carp at the lack of order in Philippians "forget that Paul was a man, and an apostle, before he was a theologian; and are actually surprised at his not giving to this familiar letter the methodical order of a treatise." ¹ This "Epistle is like a window into the Apostle's own bosom." ² Let us gratefully and reverently look in to see what Paul has revealed of Christ in himself. We do not know that he used an amanuensis for this Epistle, though that was his usual custom (as in Rom. 16:22). He may have written it all as he did the little letter to Philemon (verse 19, "I Paul write it with mine own hand"). Timothy and Epaphroditus were with Paul when he wrote to the Philippians and either of them (in lieu of another scribe) could have performed the function for Paul. And yet it is quite possible that he penned this love letter with his own hand. At any rate he put his heart into it and some of the noblest passages that were ever penned by mortal man are here. Paul was a versatile man and his style adapted itself to the subject matter and the mood of the moment, as is the case with all men of real eloquence and power of speech.

¹ "Early Christian Literature," p. 107.

² "Introduction to the Literature of the New Testament," pp. 170-176.

³ ἐπιστολαί.

2. Paul in Rome.

He does not say so, nor does he necessarily imply it, though that is the most natural inference from the incidental allusions in the Epistle. There are some scholars who hold that Paul was in prison at Ephesus when he wrote the Epistle to the Philippians. The

¹ Sabatier, "The Apostle Paul," p. 252.

² Shaw, "The Pauline Epistles," p. 419.

Ephesian imprisonment is largely hypothetical and the theory due to a possible interpretation of 1 Corinthians 15:32 ("I fought with beasts at Ephesus") and 2 Corinthians 1:8-9 ("concerning our affliction which befell us in Asia" and "the sentence¹ of death within ourselves"). The idea here is, according to this theory, that Paul languished in prison in Ephesus and came near to death. It is possible to take "prætorian guard" (Phil. 1:13) for a band of soldiers in Ephesus and by a stretch "Cæsar's household" (Phil. 4:22) of messengers in Ephesus, but the situation and outlook of the Epistle do not belong to any known period in Ephesus. Cæsarea can be made a much more plausible location for Paul when he wrote the letter. The arguments of Paulus (1799) and Boettger (1837) for Cæsarea have been adopted and enlarged by O. Holtzmann.² But at most only a possible case is made out. The use of prætorium³ for an imperial residence outside of Rome is undoubted (Kennedy, Phil. in "Exp. Greek Testament," Vol. III, p. 404) and it occurs for Herod's palace also (Acts 23:35) in Cæsarea. We know that the Augustan band (Acts 27:1)⁴ was at Cæsarea. But even if Cæsar's household⁵ is equivalent to these soldiers or the prætorian guard, it is still far more likely that the real household of Cæsar

¹ τὸ ἀπόκριμα τοῦ θανάτου, the answer of death.

² Theol. Lit., 1890, col. 177.

⁴ σπείρης Σεβαστῆς.

³ πραιτώριον.

⁵ οἰκία Καίσαρος.

in Rome is meant. We know that later there were Christians in the imperial circles and it is by no means unlikely that Paul was able to reach some of the slaves in the home of Nero by the help of the soldier to whom he was chained. It is true that the jealousy of the Judaizing Christians pictured in Philippians 1: 15-17 does seem to suit Cæsarea better than Rome, because of its proximity to Jerusalem, but it is to be borne in mind that the Judaizers do not appear against Paul in Cæsarea, and the onset against Paul in Jerusalem in Acts 21 was due to Jews from Ephesus and not to the Judaizers. It is not at all unlikely that the Judaizers would reappear in Rome after their defeat in Jerusalem, Antioch, Galatia, and Corinth. It is very difficult, besides, to think of Paul as expecting a speedy release in Cæsarea, either at the hands of Felix or Festus, according to the narrative in Acts 24-26. There was delay also in Rome since Luke in closing his story in Acts (28: 30) states that Paul had already spent two whole years¹ in his own hired house. Nero, like Tiberius, was noted for his dilatory habits and no accusers may have come against Paul.

When Paul wrote to the Philippians time enough had elapsed since his arrival in Rome for the Philippian church to hear of his arrival and condition and to send Epaphroditus with messages and gifts, for Epaphroditus to fall ill, for the Philippians to hear of it, and for Epaphroditus to be distressed over their sorrow, and to recover his health (Phil. 2 : 25-30). We do not know, of course, how long this was nor precisely how long Paul was in prison in Rome before his release, assuming, as I do, that he did not fall a victim to the hate of Nero in connection with the burning of Rome in A. D. 64. We may say then that Paul had left Rome before the early summer of A. D. 64. He may have reached Rome in the spring of A. D. 59 or 60. Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon were sent together by Onesimus and Tychicus (Philemon 10, 13; Col. 4 : 7-9; Eph. 6 : 21 f.). They were also written from Rome, I hold, and not from Cæsarea or Ephesus. It is not clear whether Philippians was despatched before or after this group to Asia. The common opinion is that Philippians was sent afterwards and just before Paul's release, because he expects to be set free when he wrote to Philippi (1 : 25-26). But he is just as confident of getting free when he writes to Philemon and asks for a lodging to be made ready for him (22). The apparent absence of Luke and Aristarchus (Phil. 2 : 20) is a puzzle, but we have no right to say that they remained with Paul constantly in Rome. The presence of Timothy surely calls for no explanation. The doctrinal aspect of the Epistle comes in well between the Judaizing controversy in the great doctrinal Epistles (1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Romans) and the Christological controversy raised by incipient Gnosticism in the Lycus Valley and other parts of Asia (Colossians, Ephesians). Thus we have an echo of the Judaizing trouble in Philippians 1:15-17 and 3:1-2, while in Philippians 2:5-11 Paul has his greatest passage concerning the Person of Christ. There was probably no great space of time between Philippians and the other three (Philemon, Colossians, Ephesians) Epistles of the First Roman Imprisonment. Till we can get further light on this point I follow Lightfoot in placing Philippians before the others, though not long before. Lightfoot's essay on "St. Paul in Rome" (pp. 1-29 of his commentary on Philippians) is still the masterpiece on this topic. We can fill in some of the details in the picture of Paul's life in Rome, whither he had come at last. He had long planned to come to the Imperial City (Acts 19:21; Rom. 1:13; 15:22, 32). In spite of all the hindrances of Satan and the Jews Paul was to go to Rome (Acts 23:11) for he was to stand before Cæsar (27:24) to whom he had appealed. He had not expected to come to Rome as a prisoner, but he is not in despair because of that fact. Things might be worse. He has his own hired house (Acts 28:30), even if he is chained to a Roman soldier (28:20 "this chain"). He was allowed liberty to receive his friends by the Prætorian Prefect Burrhus, if so be Paul fell to his care. Ramsay indeed thinks that Paul was the rather under the care of the Princeps Perigrinorum (stratopedarch, according to some manuscripts for Acts 27:16), who was the head of the soldiers from abroad with some of whom Paul had been sent to Rome. He was a prisoner with dignity and some degree of liberty. He paid for his own lodging (in his own hired dwelling¹) and so did not have to stay in the soldiers' camp. He "received all that went in unto him"² (imperfect tense and here shows his habit). His friends had free access³ (without hindrance) to him and he preached to them the kingdom of God and the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ⁴ with all boldness.⁵ His life was therefore a busy one and he met Christians, Jews, and Gentiles, men of all classes. To all of them he presented Jesus as the Saviour from sin and the Lord of life. Lightfoot emphasizes the sharp antithesis "between the Gospel and the Empire" when Paul comes to Rome. He had seen long ago that the Roman Empire was the world-power of Antichrist (2 Thess. 2:6f.), unless, indeed, as Lightfoot suggests, Paul then looked on the Empire as the power that was restraining Antichrist, a view I do not hold. But Paul with a statesman's grasp of the situation saw that the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Cæsar were at grips with each other. He longed to win this world empire to Christ and laid his plans to that end. His appeal to

¹ διετείαν ὕλην.

¹ ἐν ἰδίῳ μισθώματι.

² ἀπεδέχετο.

³ ἀκωλύτως.

⁴ τὰ περὶ τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ.

⁵ μετὰ πάσης παρρησίας.

Cæsar sharpened the issue, though Nero as yet had taken no notice of Christianity. The official attitude of Rome was still probably the lofty indifference and tolerance of Gallio which looked upon Christianity as a variety of the Jewish superstition and hence a religio licita.¹ At Rome the greatest preacher of Christianity necessarily gave fresh impetus to the cause of Christ, as we shall see, and made Christians "a mark for the wanton attack of the tyrant. The preaching of Paul was the necessary antecedent to the persecution of Nero" (Lightfoot, Phil., p. 2). The shadow of Nero falls across Paul's path because he had appealed directly to him. Even if Nero finally dismissed the case without a formal trial, Paul was still at the mercy of the Roman Emperor. Roman power and Roman citizenship loom large before Paul now and bring out more strongly the imperial aspects of the kingdom of God.

The character of the church at Rome was mixed, as seems probable from Philippians 1:12-20 and from Romans 1, 2, 15. They were partly Jews and partly Gentiles, though the Jewish element apparently predominated. Rome itself was the home of men of all races and all lands, a conglomerate like New York to-day. Paul had already many friends in Rome, if we still take, as I do, Romans 16 as a genuine part of the Epistle to the Romans. Rome drew people like a magnet from all parts of the world, and Christians came as well as others. Probably few people of social or political importance in Rome had as yet identified themselves with this "superstitio externa" (Tacitus), with which Pomponia Græcina, wife of Plautius, Britain's conqueror, was charged. A generation later, Lightfoot notes (pp. 21 f.), "Flavius Clemens and his wife Flavia Domitilla, both cousins of Domitian, were accused of 'atheism,' and condemned by the emperor." Legend has claimed as Christians "the poet Lucan, the philosopher Epictetus, the powerful freedmen Narcissus and Epaphroditus, the emperor's mistresses, Acte and Poppæa, a strange medley of good and bad," but without a particle of proof.

¹ Prof. D. Plooij, of Leiden (see The Expositor, December, 1914, February, 1917, and M. Jones' reply March, 1915), contends for the idea that Luke wrote the Acts as an apologetic for Paul to influence Jewish and Roman opinion about Paul favourably for his release from his first imprisonment. He does not mean that the book was ever formally presented to Nero, but that it was conceived as a defense of Paul's career. This interpretation explains the attention given to the arrest in Jerusalem and the imprisonment in Cæsarea.

More interest attaches to the presence in Rome of the Stoic philosopher Seneca as Nero's friend and adviser. The subject has a fascination for Lightfoot (pp. 270-333) and there is small doubt that Paul had adequate knowledge of Stoicism. He had probably met it in Tarsus, the home of Athenodorus. In Athens Paul argued with the Stoics (Acts 17: 18). Many of the ethical teachings of Paul's Epistles are parallel to those of the Stoics as seen in the writings of Seneca and Epictetus. Many of these were more or less current proverbs and sayings of the time. But there is no real evidence that Paul and Seneca met or that they had any literary connection. "The Letters of St. Paul and Seneca" are certainly spurious. Ramsay ("St. Paul the Traveller," p. 355) thinks that Seneca exerted a restraining influence of great value on Nero till his disgrace and retirement in A. D. 62, when Nero became much worse under the baleful influence of Tigellinus. The fact that Nero, Seneca, and Paul are in Rome at the same time appeals to one's imagination. Nero is the embodiment of willful power and wanton ambition. Seneca is the adroit and suave worldly-wise philosopher in the imperial court where he preaches lofty maxims for others to practice, a Stoic in creed and a hair-splitter in practice like the Jewish Pharisee. Both would scorn to notice Paul the provincial prisoner, a Jew and worse, a Christian, an intellectual outcast with no standing with gods or men. The very pride of Nero and Seneca lifted Paul to greater heights by contrast. This "prisoner of Christ" ¹ (Eph. 3 : 1), this "slave of Christ Jesus" ² (Phil. 1 : 1), this "ambassador in a chain" ³ (Eph. 6 : 20), is conscious of his spiritual, moral, and intellectual superiority to Nero, Seneca, and all the minions of the world-power of that age. He was the ambassador ⁴ from the Lord Jesus in heaven

¹ δέσμιος τοῦ χριστοῦ.

² δοῦλος, same root (δε-) as in δέ-σ-μιος bondsman.

³ ὁπὲρ οὗ πρὸς βέβω ἐν ἀλύσει.

⁴ πρὸς βέβω.

to the court of each soul in Rome and all the world. The proud court of Nero was to Paul but an incident and an item in his world program. The outcome has vindicated Paul as all the world knows. The great man is the man who does the really great task in spite of appearances. The glitter of tinsel in Rome did not confuse the eyes of Paul. He was able to grasp the elements of real power in the world and to work with God and to abide God's time. One is tempted to linger with this hero of faith as he makes Rome the new world capital of spiritual energy and power. He vitalizes the Roman Church (Phil. 1 : 12-20) and directs the enterprise of Christian missions in the Lycus Valley, in Philippi, and wherever there was call for cheer and guidance. He is guiding the forces that will ultimately overthrow the world-powers of evil and make Nero's power puny and Seneca's sophistries puerile.

3. The City of Philippi.

The ancient name was Crenides (Strabo vii. 331) or springs ("Little Fountains"). Philip II of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great, gave his name to each one of the springs and hence Philippi (plural) for the town. The city occupied a strategic position on a hill, between the rivers Strymon and Nestus, which commanded a view of the plain of Druma with the river Gangites or Angites (Herod. vii. 113) and overlooked also the mountain pass between Pangæus and Hæmus. It is nine miles from its seaport, Neapolis (the modern Kavala). Philip seized it and exploited it for its gold and silver mines, which were of great service for his wars and helped him as much as his use of the Macedonian phalanx. The gold went before and paved the way for the phalanx. He gained a revenue from these mines of a thousand talents a year (Diodorus xvi. 8).

With the battle of Pydna in B. C. 168 Macedonia became Roman and in B. C. 146 one Roman province. But Strabo (vii. 331) says that it was now "a small settlement" (κατοικία μικρά) and the exhaustion of the mines marked its decline as a commercial point. In the autumn of B. C. 42 Cassius and Brutus successively met defeat here (twenty days apart) at the hands of Octavius and Antony; and the defeat and suicide of Cassius and Brutus marked the end of the Roman republic. Macedonia and Achaia were at first senatorial provinces, then at their own request imperial under Tiberius (Tac. Ann. i. 76) and senatorial again under Claudius (Snet. Claud. 25). Octavius was much impressed by the position and importance of Philippi and made it a military colony (Colonia Iulia Philippensis) with the jus Italicum. Copper coins of Philippi have the inscription Colonia Iulia Augusta Victrix Philippensium. This title was given after the battle of Actium B. C. 31, when the colony was largely strengthened by Italian partisans of Antony displaced at Rome by followers of Octavius. The city was thus a colony ¹ (Acts 16:12) with many privileges, immunity from taxation being the chief one. The people also had the right to own and sell property like other Roman citizens and the right of civil action (vindicatio). The mother city was copied closely and the colony was in reality "a miniature Rome" (Vincent) even in the form and the appearance of the city. Roman inscriptions were on the coinage. The city had its own magistrates (Duumviri) who called themselves Prætores ² (Acts 16:20-38). The city was exempt from interference from the provincial government.³ The famous Egnatian Way (Via Egnatia) ran by Philippi and added to its importance as an outpost of Rome. It is not clear what Luke means by "the first of the district" ⁴ (Acts 16:12). Thessalonica was the capital of the province and Amphipolis, thirty-three miles away, was a larger city. But Philippi, because a colony and in such a strategic position, may still have been the most important in rank in this district of Macedonia.

The village of Filibedjik or Filibat, which preserved the name Philippi, has now vanished. Near by is the modern village of Ratchka, in a ravine to one side of the ancient city which was on the height. But "an enclosure of rough stones preserves traces of the Hellenic wall" (Vincent, Int. Crit. C., p. xvii.)

¹ κολωνία.

² στρατηγοί.

³ Mommsen, "Provinces of the Roman Empire," i., pp. 299-302.

⁴ πρώτη τῆς μερίδος.

upon the hill, while the plain below is covered with ruins and the theatre can still be seen on the face of the acropolis fronting Mount Pangæus. The rocks around are covered with inscriptions to the ancient gods, "a veritable museum of mythology" (Heuzy and Daumet, "Mission Archéologique de Macédoine," p. 86). Traces exist of a temple dedicated to the Roman god Silvanus, one of the popular deities of the imperial era. He was considered "the sacred guardian of the Emperor" (Kennedy, "Exp. Greek Testament," Vol. III, p. 400). Two statues of this god have been found, one of which may have stood in the temple here at Philippi. Tablets also have been found with the names of the members of the sacred college of the temple. Some of these names (like Crescens, Pudens, Secundus, Trophimus) are the same as those of some of Paul's friends. The god Mên was also worshipped here and Dionysus, the favourite god of Thrace, had his chief sanctuary in the mountains near by. There was plenty of religion, such as it was, in Philippi, when Paul and his party first appeared here.

4. Paul in Philippi.

Situated on one of the main trade routes east and west, Philippi offered a splendid opportunity for Paul's first work in Europe.¹ "Philip and Alexander, Æmilius, Mummius, and Octavianus had thus prepared the way for Paul" (Vincent, p. xviii.). The Macedonian Cry¹ (Acts 16:8-10) was not specifically from Philippi. It was simply "a certain Macedonian man"² who was standing in the vision and urging Paul: "Cross over into Macedonia and help us."³ This incident is in one of the "we-sections" of Acts which fact shows that Luke, the author of the book, was present. Ramsay⁴ says that Paul, since the Macedonians and Greeks dressed alike, recognized the man in his dream by sight as one already known to him. Hence he argues that the man was Luke who had talked to Paul before he had his vision about the need in Macedonia. Ramsay concludes further that Luke now lived in Philippi, as is shown also by the fact that Luke continued in Philippi for some five years after Paul's first visit. We do not know whether Luke was a Macedonian by birth if he now lived there. There is some support for the idea that he was a native of Antioch in Syria. It is not clear whether Luke first met Paul in Alexandria Troas, or had already been with him in Galatia during his illness there (Gal. 4:13).⁵ But, at any rate, we know the names of Paul's three companions (Silas or Silvanus, Timothy,

¹ Ramsay, "Church in the Roman Empire," pp. 56, 70.

¹ In the second missionary journey, A. D. 50-51.

² ἀνὴρ Μακεδὼν τις.

³ διαβάς εἰς Μακεδονίαν βοήθησον ἡμῖν.

⁴ "St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen," p. 201.

⁵ Shaw ("Pauline Epistles," p. 400) thinks that Luke now and Luke) who went with him from Alexandria Troas to Philippi. They all "concluded" ¹ (Acts 16:10) with Paul that God called them to evangelize Macedonia. The cry was the cry of one man, but he plead for his country, and it was the voice of God.

Paul is in Philippi three times. The first time is recorded in Acts 16:11-40, and the narrative is full and vivid and adds further point to the view that Luke now made Philippi his home. Ramsay ("St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen," p. 206) thinks that Luke here shows "the true Greek pride in his own city." One is struck at once by the absence of Jewish influence in Philippi and the prominence of the Roman element in the narrative (M. N. Tod, "Philippi in Int. St. Bible Enc."). There was no synagogue in the city, showing that the number of Jews there were small. It was now a military outpost rather than a great commercial emporium like Thessalonica where Jews abounded. The praying place ² (Acts 16:13) may have been in reality a synagogue. There seems no doubt that proseuche was used for synagogue. ³ The location of the praying place several miles out of town by the riverside was due to the need of water for the Jewish ablutions. The worshippers were mostly women, as Paul lived at Troas and met Paul in a professional way as his physician and was thus converted.

¹ συνβιβάζοντες making go together.

² προσευχή.

³ Schuerer, "Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ," Vol. II, Div. II, pp. 68-73.

and his friends found, and they did not seem to be certain (we supposed)¹ of finding the place of worship at all, having evidently failed to find a synagogue in the city as had been so easy to do in Salamis (Acts 13:5), Antioch in Pisidia (13:14-43), Iconium (14:1), etc. Here by the Gangites Paul was on the site of the battle of Philippi and near the old mines (Shaw, "Pauline Epistles," p. 405). Here, moreover, the Jews seem to have been few, for Luke does not say that Lydia was a proselyte, but a "God-fearer"² (Acts 16:14), a Gentile who had come to worship the God of the Jews, like Cornelius in Acts 10, but not necessarily one who had gone over formally to Judaism. There is no mention of Jewish converts, for the household³ of Lydia, if her employees, were probably simply "God-fearers" like herself. Some Jews may have been converted, or at any rate Paul found it necessary in his letter to warn the church against the activity of the Judaizers (Phil. 3:1-2). It was a small enough beginning that Paul was able to make. "A man had summoned Paul to Macedonia in the vision. Paul went to Macedonia and found a woman first of all" (Hayes, "Paul and His Epistles," p. 411).⁴ But this Asiatic merchant-woman

¹ ἐνομιζομεν.

² σεβόμενη τὸν θεόν.

³ ὁ οἶκος αὐτῆς.

⁴ Women seemed to occupy "a specially favourable position in Macedonia" (Kennedy, Phil., p. 402). Note mention of the activity of women in Acts 16:13; 17:4, 12. "The extant Macedonian inscriptions seem to assign to the sex a from Thyatira proved to be one of the greatest trophies in Paul's ministry. This church came to be the joy and crown of Paul (Phil. 4 : 1), and that fact was largely due to Lydia and Luke.

The Roman features of the story come out sharply in connection with the episode of the poor girl with the spirit of a python or divination.¹ Luke represents Paul as driving the spirit out of her (Acts 16 : 18) as of an unclean spirit or demon. A Pythoness was thought to have oracular power from the Pythian Apollo who had a shrine near here. She was able to earn many a penny for her masters² (16 : 19), whose slave she probably was, by her soothsaying or raving³ (16 : 16). The ancients sometimes described such a gift as that of ventriloquism,⁴ but, whatever the cause, the poor girl was exploited by a company of men for commercial purposes just as "white-slavers" exploit girls to-day for gold. We are making some progress in the United States when at last Congress has passed a child-labour law. It is an old trick, this use of helpless children and women to fill the pockets of greed. Paul touched this "syndicate in its tenderest spot" (Shaw, "Pauline Epistles," p. 406). He had no respect for the vested interests higher social influence than is common among the civilized nations of antiquity" (Lightfoot, Phil., p. 56 ; cf. also Achelis, Zeitschr. f. N. T. Wiss. I, 2, pp. 97-98).

¹ πνεῦμα πύθωνα.

² οἱ κύριοι.

³ μαντευομένη.

⁴ ἐγγαστρίμυθος. Ramsay, "St. Paul the Traveller," p. 215, accepts the view that the girl was a ventriloquist.

of capital that traded in human life and human souls. He set the girl free from the spell of Satan and from the grip of her enslavers. Their fury knew no bounds and was as violent as is the rage of men to-day who are compelled to give up the liquor business, gambling, or any other form of graft or greed that fattens on the weaknesses of human nature. These men (the girl's masters) were Romans, as is shown by the appeal to race prejudice which they make in the effort to stir up the Romans against the Jews (Acts 16:20f.). The Romans were more than half the population of the city, though there was still a solid substratum of the old Macedonian stock. So then the masters of the girl feel perfectly safe in the spurious cry which they put forth to the archons¹ (16:20, the common Greek term for chief magistrates) or the prætors² (16:21, the Latin term claimed by the magistrates, though duumviri was the technical title) in the market-place³ like the Roman forum. These officers are accompanied by lictors⁴ (16:35, 38) or sergeants who carry the fasces with which they scourge Paul and Silas⁵ (16:22). They are charged with a breach of public order and the introduction of customs⁶ unlawful for Romans to observe. It was a skillful turn, for "the population prided themselves on their Roman character and actually called themselves Romans" (Ramsay, "St. Paul the

¹ τοὺς ἀρχοντας. ² τοὺς στρατηγοὺς. ³ εἰς τὴν ἀγοράν.

⁴ ῥ' αἰβδουχοι.

⁵ ῥ' αἰζδιζεῖν.

⁶ ἔθνη.

Traveller," p. 218). No chance was offered for Paul and Silas to defend themselves, but they are at once condemned after an onset by the multitude who are completely deceived by the pious and patriotic claptrap of the accusers. The magistrates themselves give way to excited indignation and the farcical trial is over. Paul and Silas are placed in the inner prison for safety with their feet fast in the stocks.¹ The forms of Roman law are duly observed, but the spirit of justice is utterly violated. The sudden change of base by the magistrates next morning after the earthquake is not explained by Luke (Acts 16: 35)² when they sent the lictors and said to the jailor: "Let these men go." The magistrates may have heard what had taken place and may also have become ashamed of their conduct. But this request gave Paul his opportunity to state the fact of his own Roman citizenship and to recount how Roman law had been violated in his imprisonment. Everything done to him and Silas was illegal, they being Romans. They had been beaten publicly and uncondemned³

¹ εἰς τὴν ἐσωτέραν φυλακὴν.

² The addition in Codex Bezae ("assembled together in the Agora, and remembering the earthquake that had taken place, they were afraid, and ") is hardly genuine. Cf. Ramsay, "St. Paul the Traveller," p. 223.

³ Ramsay, "St. Paul the Traveller," p. 225, thinks that Luke has not accurately rendered Paul here, who probably spoke in Latin and said re incognita, "without investigating our case." But it did aggravate the matter for the imprisonment to happen without condemnation.

and cast into prison. It was a sudden turn of the wheel of fortune and the magistrates are themselves in grave peril. They come and in apologetic style beg Paul and Silas to leave before further complications arise. They do go, but not before their own innocence is established and Christianity is vindicated in Philippi. We do not know how long Paul was in Philippi, though Luke uses "many days" (Acts 16:18) of the case of the girl with the spirit of divination. But a sturdy church of Gentile Christians is now established before Paul leaves. Paul went to Lydia's house and "comforted the brethren," showing that men were won also to Christ here, though the term for "brethren" probably included the "sisters" also. Lightfoot (Phil., p. 57) notes how in Philippi the gospel exerted a powerful effect on woman, on the slave, and on family life (Lydia and the jailor). The church in the house of Lydia, for they had no other meeting place at first, grew to be the most loyal and helpful of all the Pauline churches. When Paul and Silas left Philippi, Luke and Timothy remained behind. Troubles came to the Philippian church "in much proof of affliction" (2 Cor. 8:2) at a later time, we know, and probably also soon after Paul left, for the Philippians knew the "proof" of Timothy (Phil. 2:22). It is meet, therefore, that Paul should associate Timothy (now with Paul in Rome) with him in the salutation of the Epistle (Phil. 1 : 1), though Timothy is in no sense co-author with Paul. Timothy joined Paul and Silas in Berea (Acts 17 : 14) and probably before that in Thessalonica (Phil. 4 : 16), "for even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again to my need." Luke, however, apparently remained in Philippi.

¹ τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς.

Paul appears in Philippi again during the third mission tour (A. D. 55-57) when he hurried over from Troas to Macedonia ahead of time in his eagerness to see Titus on his way back from Corinth (2 Cor. 2 : 12 ; 7 : 5-14 ; Acts 20 : 1). We do not know that Paul stopped at Philippi and met Titus there, but there is every probability of it, though Paul tells us that "even in Macedonia" he had no relief till Titus came (2 Cor. 7 : 5 f.). We naturally think of him as waiting with Luke and Lydia in Philippi who could cheer his despondent spirit in the meanwhile. He was preceded by Timothy and Erastus (Acts 19 : 22). He had originally planned to go first to Corinth from Ephesus and then to Macedonia and back to Corinth and Jerusalem (2 Cor. 1 : 15 f.), but the acuteness of the crisis in Corinth made Paul decide to postpone his visit to Corinth till they had one more chance for repentance, and so he sent Titus to them with a rather sharp letter (2 Cor. 2 : 1-4), the effect of which he awaited with eager anxiety. The outcome was joyful on the whole (2 Cor. 7 : 5-15), though the minority remained stubborn (2 Cor. 2 : 5-11 ; 10-13). While in Philippi Paul apparently wrote 2 Corinthians, if we take the Epistle as a unit, as I still hold to be the most plausible theory. Paul is still in Macedonia when he writes (2 Cor. 8: 1-5; 9: 2-4). But Luke, for some reason, tells us nothing in Acts about this visit of Paul to Philippi and Macedonia.

After three months in Achaia (Acts 20: 3) Paul suddenly changed his plans again and, instead of sailing direct to Syria, went on to Philippi, where he met Luke again who remained with him till the close of Acts. Luke gives the names of Paul's companions in travel (Acts 20: 4), messengers of the churches to accompany Paul in carrying the great gift to the poor saints in Jerusalem, and he mentions the fact that Paul remained in Philippi to keep the passover there (Acts 20: 6), probably a slight evidence of the presence of some Jewish Christians by this time in the church in Philippi.

We know, if we may follow the Pastoral Epistles as letters of Paul as I do, that Paul was in Macedonia once more, though after he wrote the Epistle to the Philippians. When he wrote to the church, he expressed the hope that he would himself be able to come "shortly"¹ (Phil. 2: 24). He did come to Macedonia again after his release from imprisonment in Rome, and was there when he wrote the first Epistle to Timothy (1 Tim. 1: 3). It is certainly highly probable that Paul went once more to Philippi where he could thank them face to face for their many tokens of affection and support during the years. There may, indeed, have been other visits, but these four are reasonably certain.

¹ ταχέως.

5. The Philippian Church and Paul.

Paul himself tells us of the devotion and zeal of the Philippian church. While Paul was in Thessalonica shortly after leaving Philippi (Acts 17: 1-9), the church in Philippi had sent twice at least gifts for his needs (Phil. 4: 16). They kept up this good work when Paul went to Corinth and was in want, for it was not Corinth, but Philippi alone that at first supplied his wants above what he could make by his own hands (2 Cor. 11: 9; Phil. 4: 15). The example of Philippi was later followed by some other churches, though never by all. "I robbed other churches," Paul ironically says, "taking wages of them that I might minister unto you" (2 Cor. 11: 8). "In the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church had fellowship with me in the matter of giving and receiving but ye only" (Phil. 4: 15). Probably Thessalonica and Berea soon fell into line with Philippi and helped Paul in Corinth. Certainly Thessalonica became "an example to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia" (1 Thess. 1: 7). From them "has echoed forth the word of the Lord"¹ (1: 8).

¹ ἐξήχηται.

But no one of the Pauline churches was so thoroughly missionary in spirit and deed as that in Philippi. The church in Antioch has as its glory that it rose above the narrow prejudices of the Judaizers in Jerusalem, the Pharisaic (anti-mission or "Hard-shell" element there), and welcomed the propaganda among the Gentiles, though there is no evidence that the Antioch church contributed anything but goodwill to the enterprise. It was a Greek church and was open to this world-movement. But the Roman church in Philippi rallied heartily and steadily to the practical support of Paul's missionary campaign to win the Roman Empire for Christ. They set the pace for all time for the churches that wish to exemplify the love of Christ for men. It was all the more beautiful that it was voluntary and continuous. The Greek church at Antioch had responded to the appeal of Paul and Barnabas to send a contribution to the poor saints in Jerusalem in proof of the genuineness of their conversion (Acts 11 : 29 f.), but they did not at first catch the vision of practical coöperation with Paul in his great missionary enterprise. This glory belongs to the church in Philippi, who thus became Paul's "joy and crown" (Phil. 4 : 1). They had true "fellowship" with Paul in the work of the Gospel. At first they alone had this "partnership,"¹ for this is the true meaning of the word (Phil. 1 : 5 ; 4 : 14 f.). They alone at first were Paul's

¹ κοινωνία.

"co-sharers" ¹ (Phil. 1 : 7) in this grace of giving the Gospel to the lost world. It may seem amazing that the early churches were so slow to respond to the missionary appeal. But it is not for modern Christians to say much on this subject till we do enough to entitle us to speak.

The church at Philippi probably did far more for Paul than he has told in his letters. The last instance of their "fellowship" after an interval when they "lacked opportunity" (Phil. 4 : 10) was while Paul was in Rome the first time when they sent Epaphroditus, "your messenger and minister, to my need" (Phil. 2 : 25). They seem to have fairly outdone themselves this time and their gift was "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice, acceptable, well-pleasing to God" (Phil. 4 : 18). They may have sent a letter to Paul by Epaphroditus and he may have written other letters of thanks to them (Phil. 3 : 1).

Paul leaned on the church in Philippi heavily in raising the great collection for the poor saints in Jerusalem from the churches in Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia. The churches in Achaia were quick to promise and slow to pay, like some modern churches. Under the spur of Titus's leadership they promised a whole year ahead (2 Cor. 8 : 10) and Paul used their prompt pledges to stir the Macedonian churches to activity (9 : 2). And now in turn he has to spur the Achaian churches on to actual payment by the liberality and prompt paying of the Macedonian churches (8: 1-15; 9: 1-5). Paul does not wish to be ashamed of the Achaian churches if he comes with some of the Macedonian brethren to whom he has boasted of the Achaian liberal promises. It is all a very modern situation drawn from life. But it is clearly the church at Philippi, poor and generous, that has long had the habit of giving, that set the pace for the other Macedonian churches and for the Achaian churches as well.

¹ συγκαινωνοὺς μου.

The church in Philippi no longer exists. The Turks have swept over Macedonia like the locusts of Egypt. But its early fame is secure. Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, stops in Philippi early in the second century on his way to Rome where he is condemned as a Christian and is thrown to the wild beasts. The Philippian Christians treated Ignatius kindly and wrote a letter of sympathy to his home church in Antioch and to Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, asking him to send them copies of any letters of Ignatius which he might have, a side-light on the circulation of Paul's Epistles. Polycarp complied with their request and also wrote the church a letter of his own full of comfort and cheer. Polycarp censures a presbyter, Valens, and his wife for avarice, though the church at Philippi seems to be doing well. The church lived on apparently to modern times, but no story of the destruction of city and church is known. Le Quien (Or. Chr. II, p. 70) gives the name of the Bishop of Philippi when he wrote in 1740.

6. Purpose of the Epistle.

In reality Paul's immediate purpose is to express his appreciation of the love and kindness of the Philippian church in their gracious generosity by the hand of Epaphroditus (Phil. 1: 3-11; 2: 19-30; 4: 10-20). Three times he takes up the subject. He explains the occasion of the Epistle to be the return of Epaphroditus, the bearer of their gift and now of his Epistle to Philippi after his dangerous illness. It is all perfectly natural and obvious. Paul tells also something of his own situation in Rome and expounds his comfort in Christ and urges the Philippians to constant joy. He strikes a jubilant note, though a prisoner himself, as he and Silas sang praises at midnight in the Philippian jail (Acts 16: 25). Paul sings the song of victory and not of despair. It is thus a letter of joy and a letter of love. The sheer simplicity and beauty of his rapture in Christ make this Epistle a favourite with all who know the deep things of God in Christ. It is easy to take the theology of Philippians and apply it to modern conditions. The mass of modern men and women have to live their lives in untoward circumstances. They must do their work and sing their song in spite of prison or pain, of penury or pressure, of perversity or pugnacity. The very sanity and serenity of Paul's piety bring his loftiest flights within the range of the humblest of us who gladly try to imitate Paul as he imitated Christ. Lightfoot (p. 72) says : " The Epistle to the Philippians is not only the noblest reflexion of St. Paul's personal character and spiritual illumination, his large sympathies, his womanly tenderness, his delicate courtesy, his frank independence, his entire devotion to the Master's service ; but as a monument of the power of the Gospel it yields in importance to none of the Apostolic writings."

7. The Church and the Officers.

Paul does not here use the word church,¹ but he writes " to all the saints in Christ Jesus that are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." ² Evidently Paul has the church in mind because he mentions the two classes of officers, " bishops and deacons," and yet 'he addresses the Christians in Philippi as individuals (" all ") rather than as an organization. The unit in the kingdom of God is not the local church and not the officers. The church is made up of individual believers and the church chooses its own officers. The believers are here addressed as " saints." The term was already in use for the covenant people of Israel as " the saints in Jerusalem " (1 Macc. 10 : 39), " the holy nation," " the holy people," " the saints "

¹ ἐκκλησία.

² σὺν πᾶσιν τοῖς ἁγίοις ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Φιλίπποις σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις.

(cf. Ex. 19:6; Deut. 7:6; 14:2; Dan. 7:18, 22). It was natural to apply it to the true Israel, the believers in Christ, "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation" (1 Pet. 2:9). Lightfoot (in loco) notes that even the irregularities and profligacies of the Corinthian church did not prevent Paul's use of the word for this church "called to be saints" (1 Cor. 1:2).¹ It is really the technical term for Christians on a par with "believers"² and carries with it the atmosphere of consecration found in the Old Testament usage (Septuagint) as in Leviticus 11:44-45. The term is used of the priests who consecrated themselves to God, who were set apart from the people for the service of God. So it is used of the chosen people who were set apart from the nations as God's instrument in the work of redemption. Now it is applied to those of all nations who are set apart from both Jew and Gentile as the elect of God. The idea of holiness³ as a duty is necessarily involved in the word, as appropriate and obligatory, though not always actual. Its use in the Gospels seems to be confined to Matthew 27:52.

¹ The adjective ἅγιος is common in the inscriptions as θεῶν ἁγίῳ ὑψίστῳ OGIS 378¹ (A. D. 18-19). See Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary of the Greek Testament."

² οἱ πιστοί.

³ ἁγιασμένη, ἁγιότης, ἁγιασμός. The verb ἁγιάζω is not yet found outside of Biblical and ecclesiastical Greek. The ancient Greeks used ἁγίζω, ἁγισμός in their religious language. Cf. Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary of the Greek Testament."

Since the Jews would apply the term "the saints" to themselves, Paul here adds "in Christ Jesus" (Chrysostom, in loco). This is Paul's common idiom for the mystic union between the believer and Christ. Jesus used the figure of the vine and the branches (John 15 : 1-8). The branch abides in the vine. Paul uses "in Christ Jesus" forty-eight times, "in Christ" thirty-four, "in the Lord" fifty (Vincent, Int. Crit. Comm.).¹ "These words sum up Paul's Christianity" (Kennedy, Exp. Gk. Test.). The idiom is apparently original with Paul, but one must compare the words of Jesus, "Abide in me, and I in you" (John 15 : 4).² The most intimate and vital union with Christ is Paul's idea, not a perfunctory ecclesiastical connection. Paul assumes that the nominal saints in Philippi are real saints in the sense of actual life in Christ; not in the sense of absolute sinlessness, but of living connection with Christ who vitalizes and sustains each one. They are members of Christ's body of which He is the Head (1 Cor. 12). It is not professional saints who pose as superior to other believers that Paul has in mind, but he makes his salutation to all those who live in Christ as the sphere of the spiritual activity. This inclusive circle cuts out other circles. But Paul does not ignore the officers of the saints or church, though they occupy a secondary¹ place in his mind. The officers are important, but not primary. The individual saint is primary. Church officers are made out of saints. The fundamental reason that we do not have better preachers (bishops) and deacons is that they come from the body of the saints, a part of whom they still are. Paul does not draw a line of separation between clergy and laity. He rather emphasizes the bond of union by the use of "together with."² To be sure, the progress and usefulness of a church are largely gauged by the efficiency of the officers. Like priest like people. And yet the other side is true also. Like people like priest. So long as the saints are sound at heart Christianity will outlive the vagaries and follies of sporadic preachers. A corrupt ministry will ruin any church if condoned. Certainly preachers and deacons are not free from the responsibility for sainthood by their official position. Noblesse oblige. Their very prominence imposes higher burdens. Fundamentally the average church member has precisely the same obligations and limitations that the preacher has, but practically the preacher and deacon cannot escape an extra responsibility because of their leadership (cf. Jas. 3: 1).

¹ Cf. also Deissmann, Die Neutestamentliche Formel "in Christo Jesu" (1892).

² Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research," pp. 588 f.

¹ The use of σύν shows this. It is not certain whether σύν here has the idea of "plus" or "including" since the preposition bears either connotation. The papyri show both ideas (Moulton and Milligan, "Lexical Notes from the Papyri," Expositor, Sept., 1911). The context favours the idea of "including" here. On the whole Paul uses μετά much more frequently than σύν, particularly in the two last groups of his Epistles. He has μετά seven and σύν four times in Philippians.

² σύν.

We are confronted here with the whole problem of the Christian ministry (its origin, character, and functions). Bishop Lightfoot¹ has proven that in the New Testament "bishop" and "elder" are used interchangeably for the same office as in Acts 20: 17, 28; 1 Timothy 3: 1-7 and 5: 17-19; Titus 1: 5-7; 1 Peter 5: 1-2. See also Clement's "Epistle to the Corinthians," § 42. Lightfoot translates the words² in Philippians 1: 1 "presbyters and deacons" to make it plain to his readers that Paul is not using "bishop" in the sense of Ignatius in the second century who gives a threefold³ ministry, "the bishop, presbyters, deacons," and insists on the distinction. Ignatius makes the bishop supreme and the embodiment of ecclesiastical authority.⁴ It is clear that in the New Testament usage the Christian ministry is in a more or less fluid state as to the functions of different members. General terms occur in 1 Thesalonians 5: 12, "them that labour among you, and

¹ Cf. note on "The synonymns bishop" (ἐπίσκοπος) and "presbyter" (πρεσβύτερος) (Phil., pp. 95-99) and dissertation on "The Christian Ministry" (Phil., pp. 181-269) and Lightfoot's "Apostolic Fathers" (Vols. I, II).

² ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις.

³ τῶ ἐπισκόπῳ, πρεσβυτέροις, διακόνοις. Letter to Polycarp § 6.

⁴ Cf. Ep. to Smyrn., Ch. VIII.

are over you in the Lord, and admonish you.”¹ In Hebrews 13:7, 17, 21, we find “your leaders” commended to their memory, obedience, welcome.² The term “elders” (presbyters) first appears in Acts 11:30, but as an established body of officers who are later active in the Jerusalem conference in Acts 15. The term itself is very old in an official sense as is shown by the Septuagint usage which merely reflects the older Egyptian custom as has been amply shown by Deissmann.³ The “elders of the village” were town officers. The term also occurs for pagan priests. The technical use appears in the inscriptions of Asia Minor. Even “bishop” (ἐπίσκοπος) appears in “the technical religious diction of pre-Christian times” in inscriptions in Rhodes, curiously enough along with “scribes.”⁴ Precisely “elder” means an older man and “bishop” an overseer, but when both became technical terms no such distinction is drawn. Kennedy (in loco) suggests that “elder” applied more to status and “bishop” to function. Vincent (Phil., pp. 36-49) argues for a distinction between “bishop” and “elder,” though he admits the vague-

¹ τοὺς κοπιῶντας ἐν ὑμῖν καὶ προισταμένους ὑμῶν ἐν κυρίῳ καὶ νοουθετοῦντας ὑμᾶς.

² τῶν ἡγουμένων (-οις, -ους).

³ “Bible Studies,” pp. 154-157, 233-235. We can no longer follow Cremer in speaking of ἐπίσκοπος as “the Greek coloured designation” and πρεσβύτερος as of “Jewish colouring.”

⁴ Cf. Deissmann, “Bible Studies” γραμματεῖς, pp. 230 f.

ness of the early usage and renders (p. 4) "with the superintendents and ministers." Here at Philippi we meet a twofold ministry, though the definition of neither "bishop" nor "deacon" is given. One may note also that use of the plural "bishops" is like the plurality of "elders" found at Jerusalem (Acts 11:30) and Ephesus (20:17, 28). This fact shows clearly that "bishop" is not here used in the later ecclesiastical sense of Ignatius when one bishop is head of a large city or district with many elders and deacons under his rule.

The term deacon is of obscure etymology¹ and is a general term for one who serves. It is common in the New Testament in the general sense of servants of God or Christ (1 Cor. 3:5; 2 Cor. 6:4). It is not always clear when the word has a technical use in the New Testament or precisely what the office is meant to be. The papyri and inscriptions show the word in the general sense and for religious officials.² It is probable, though not certain, that deacons in the technical sense are described in the group of seven chosen in Acts 6:2-6 to "serve tables."³

¹ Some derive διάκονος from διήκω or διώκω (eager pursuit) and others even from διά, κόνις (dusty with running). Certainly some deacons can "raise a dust" if nothing more.

² Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary," quote Magn. 109 circa B. C. 100, where διάκονος is used for temple officials, and in CIG II, 1800, a "college" of διάκονοι is mentioned, while ibid., 3037 we see two διάκονοι, and a female διάκονος as in Rom. 16:1. See further Dibelius, Phil., p. 45 in "Handbuch zum N. T."

³ διακονεῖν τραπέζαις.

The qualifications given in 1 Timothy 3: 8-13 are not wholly different from those for bishops (1 Tim. 3: 1-7; Titus 1: 5-9). Probably it cannot be shown beyond controversy that in the beginning the bishops had charge of the spiritual functions and the deacons the business side of the church life. There were at first apostles, prophets, evangelists, shepherds, and teachers "for the perfecting of the saints" (Eph. 4: 11 f.), though strangely enough Paul does not mention bishops and deacons in this list. Both terms are likewise absent in 1 Corinthians 12: 28: "first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, then miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, divers kinds of tongues." Some have thought to see "bishops" in "governments"¹ and "deacons" in "helps."² In "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" the primacy still belongs to the apostles, prophets, and teachers (XI. 4-7; XIII. 3) as the spiritual guides of the churches, while bishops and deacons are local officers (XV. 1), though "elders" or "presbyters" are not mentioned. One may note the famous discussion on the Christian ministry in The Expositor for 1887, which was participated in by W. Sanday, G. Salmon, C. Gore, G. A. Simcox, A. Harnack, J. Rendel Harris, W. Milligan, J. Macpherson. The lower view of the origin of bishops and deacons as presidents and dispensers of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper in particular is advocated by Rev. H. F. Hamilton in "The People of God" (1912, 2 vols.).¹ There seems little doubt that the development varied in different regions. Perhaps Ignatius represents one line of development while "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" shows another. But in the course of time apostles, prophets, and teachers disappeared and a consequent readjustment of functions followed. The growth of the administrative bishop was certainly later than the New Testament period, as Lightfoot has proven. The modern "pastor" (shepherd)² of the flock is expected to be at once apostle (missionary,³ or one sent of God), bishop or overseer, shepherd to care for each lamb in the flock, herald⁴ or preacher to proclaim the message, evangelist (gospelizer⁵) to win to Christ, prophet⁶ or for-speaker for God, teacher⁷ to instruct in the way of the Lord, deacon (in the general sense of service) at the call of one and all in the community, elder or guide and counsellor. The demands upon the "bishops" have grown with the years, while those upon the "deacons" have lessened by comparison. The wise pastor seeks to throw some of his burdens upon the deacons and upon the church as a whole.

¹ κυβερνήσεις.

² ἀντιλήψεις.

¹ See his theory ably reviewed by Rev. Maurice Jones in The Expositor, August, 1916, pp. 118-135. See the other side in Loenning, "Gemeindeverfassung des Urchristentums," Theol. Lit., 1889, coll. 418-429.

² ποιμήν.

³ ἀπόστολος.

⁴ κήρυξ.

⁵ εὐαγγελιστής.

⁶ προφήτης.

⁷ διδάσκαλος.

8. The Fatherhood of God and the Lordship of Christ.

This is Paul's favourite greeting¹ as it appears also in 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, and Ephesians, and in slightly modified form in one and 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, 1 Timothy, Titus, 2 Timothy. There seems little doubt that Paul means to place Jesus Christ on an equality with God the Father in spite of the absence here of the application of the term God to Jesus. Paul ascribes divine attributes to Christ in Colossians 1:15-19, and is credited by Luke in Acts 20:28 (true text, "Church of God") with applying the term God directly to Christ. According to the probable punctuation in Romans 9:5 Paul calls Christ God, and that is the real idea in Titus 2:13.² Besides, in Philippians 2:5-11, Paul argues on the basis of Christ's being "in the form of God" and possessing "equality with God." In Colossians 2:9 he says that all the fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily in Jesus Christ. It is beside the mark, therefore, for Vincent ("Int. Crit. on Phil.," p. 5) to say: "The fact that God and Christ appear on an equality in the salutation cannot be adduced as a positive proof of the divine nature of Christ, though it falls in with Paul's words in chapter 2, and may be allowed to point to that doctrine which he elsewhere asserts. We cannot be too careful to distinguish between ideas which unconsciously underlie particular expressions, and the same ideas used with a definite and conscious dogmatic purpose. This Epistle especially has suffered from the overlooking of this distinction." Per contra, the almost unconscious attribution of deity to Jesus Christ by Paul so often and in so many ways reveals better than anything else Paul's attitude of mind towards the Person of Christ. It is not positive proof of the deity of Christ for Paul to have this opinion, to be sure, unless one is willing to follow Paul's guidance in the matter, but the repeated implication is strong proof of Paul's conception of Christ's nature and relation to God. Certainly Paul is not meaning to give a mere Trinitarian formula, since he does not mention here the Holy Spirit, though Rainy ("Expositor's Bible," Phil., p. 16) suggests that the work of the Holy Spirit is really involved in the grace and peace from the Father and the Son. Sometimes at the conclusion of the letters Paul mentions only Jesus, as in 2 Thessalonians 3:18; Galatians 6:18; Philip-pians 4:23. No name at all may be used as in Colossians 4:18 ("Grace be with you"); Titus 3:15. But in 2 Corinthians 13:13 we have the full Trinity named: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all."

¹ χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ.

² See margin of Am. St. Version "of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ." Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of Greek New Testament in Light of Historical Research," p. 786.

The term "Lord" is common in the Old Testament (Septuagint) for God, and there can be little doubt that Paul in his frequent use of this word means to affirm the essential deity of Jesus Christ. The word is common in the papyri and the inscriptions for the Roman emperors who claimed divine attributes and accepted worship. But Paul was not going to allow this pagan usage to rob him of the privilege of employing this noble word with its rich heritage. Indeed, it is quite possible that Paul made a point of applying "Lord" to Jesus so many times for the very reason that the emperors claimed it for themselves. The word in a way became the hallmark of Christianity in the Roman Empire. The Christians applied it to Jesus, the heathen to Cæsar. The Gentile Christians who once said "Lord Cæsar" now learned to say "Lord Jesus." Hence Paul says (1 Cor. 12:2f.): "Ye know that when ye were Gentiles ye were led away unto those dumb idols, howsoever ye might be led. Wherefore I make known unto you, that no man speaking in the spirit of God saith, Jesus is anathema²; and no man can say, Jesus is Lord,³ but in the Holy Spirit." During the trial of Polycarp he was urged by Herod and Nicetes to say the words "Lord Cæsar" and live: "For what is the harm in saying 'Lord Cæsar' and in offering sacrifices and doing the things following these and being spared?"¹ A Phrygian Christian, Cointus, had just renounced "Jesus as Lord" and said "Lord Cæsar" and was spared. Polycarp stoutly refused to say "Lord Cæsar" when those words meant the renunciation of "Lord Jesus." He said in defense, "I am a Christian"² and was burned as he knew³ he would be. It cost something then to say "Lord Jesus," and Paul was right in saying that no one could say these words (and mean them) except in the Holy Spirit. These three words (Lord, Jesus, Christ) present the various aspects of the work of Jesus. His human name "Jesus"⁴ means "saviour of his people from sin" (Matt. 1: 21) and the glory and dignity of the humanity is emphasized in Philippians 2: 5-11 and in the Epistle to the Hebrews (in particular ch. 2). He is the new Joshua of the people of God. The name was common enough among the Jews as Josephus testifies and the papyri also show it. Christ was at first merely the description of His Messianic mission, the Hebrew Messiah,⁵ the Anointed One. In the Gospels we usually have the article with it, the Anointed One⁶ (the Messiah) as in Matthew 1: 17;

¹ κύριος.² Ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦς.³ Κύριος Ἰησοῦς.

¹ Martyrdom of Polycarp, VIII, 2. τί γὰρ κακόν ἐστιν εἰπεῖν Κύριος Καῖσαρ, καὶ ἐπιθῆσαι καὶ τὰ τοῦτοις ἀρόλουθα καὶ διασώζεσθαι.

² Ibid., X. χριστιανός εἰμι.

³ Ibid., V. δεῖ με ζῶντα καυθῆναι.

⁴ Ἰησοῦς.

⁵ χριστός.

⁶ Μεσσίας is transliteration as Christ is translation. χριστός is the verbal adjective of χρίω to anoint.

16: 16. But its use as a title or mere proper name also occurs in the Gospels (as Matt. 1: 1) as is the rule in the Epistles and Revelation. In Paul's later Epistles we usually have "Christ Jesus" instead of "Jesus Christ," a still further development in the usage (cf. 1 Tim. 1: 1-2). Thus by "Lord Jesus Christ" Paul really presents the statement that Jesus is a real man, is the Jewish Messiah of promise, and is divine, Son of God and Son of man (cf. Luke 2: 11 "the Saviour, who is Christ the Lord"). Paul does not explain in what sense he uses "Father" as applied to God, whether the general sense in which God is the Father of all men who are His offspring (Acts 17: 26-29) or the more limited sense as Father of the redeemed (Rom. 8: 14-16). The use of "God our Father" reminds us of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6: 9).

9. Grace and Peace.

It has already been noted that Paul does not use the common word for greeting so abundant in the letters in the papyri. He may have felt that it was "too meagre for Christian intercourse" (Kennedy, in loco). Grace is from the same root¹ as the other word for greeting. Kennedy calls grace Paul's "own great watchword." It is the distinctive word for the new dispensation as John has it in his Gospel (1: 17): "For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ." It is Paul's word in his famous antithesis between legalism and law, "justified freely by his grace" (Rom. 3 : 24). "But if it is by grace, it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace" (Rom. 11 : 6). The word is constantly coming from Paul's pen and is akin to the word for joy,¹ as has just been shown. It is used for "gift" and "gratitude" and "charm" and "goodwill" and "lovingkindness." No one word in English can translate its wealth of meaning. This word, "perhaps above all others, shows the powerful remoulding of terms by Christian thought and feeling" (Kennedy, in loco). It lays emphasis on the freeness of God's lovingkindness to men (Vincent, in loco). It is the "free favour" of God, the state of grace (Rom. 5 : 2) and the power from that state (Eph. 4 : 7), the overwhelming richness of the love of God in Christ Jesus, which Paul wishes for the saints in Philippi.

¹ χαρ—root of both χαίρω (χαίρειν) and χάρις. Our word "grace" is the Latin gratia.

The other word "peace"² is a picture of "the harmony and health of that life which is reconciled to God through Jesus Christ" (Kennedy, in loco), the peace which follows from the grace. The two words thus cover the whole of the Christian experience. This word "peace" is used of nations and of individuals and implies a bond that is made, words that are spoken, as the basis on which peace rests. The Jews said "shālōm" (salaam, Arabic salam, peace) as a greeting. The angels brought a message of "peace" to men of good-will in their song of greeting to the shepherds (Luke 2 : 14). It is the Messianic greeting to those who welcome the preachers of Christ (Luke 10 : 5). But peace in the Pauline conception implies reconciliation with God in Christ (Vincent, in loco). It is the tranquil soul at peace with God. God is the God of peace (2 Cor. 13 : 11 ; Heb. 13 : 20). Jesus gave His peace as a blessing to the disciples, His parting blessing (John 14 : 27), a peace which the world could not give. Paul has this same idea when he speaks (Phil. 4 : 7) of the peace that passeth all understanding. But let no one imagine that Paul taught "peace at any price" either with man or devil. No one exhibits the spirit of courage and conflict more than Paul. He has no patience with cowardice in preachers (2 Tim. 1 : 7). Christ bade His disciples to be 'of good cheer in the midst of tribulation, for He had overcome the world (John 16 : 33). Jesus offers us repose in the midst of struggle. God's peace makes us independent of man's petty wars. Peace is not the greatest good. Righteousness out-ranks peace. "First pure, then peaceable" (Jas. 3 : 17). Only those who "do peace" may expect "the fruit of righteousness" which is sown in peace (Jas. 3 : 18). It is not always possible to live at peace with men, but the responsibility for breaking the peace should rest upon others (Rom. 12 : 18). But peace at the price of the triumph of evil is cowardly sin.

¹ χαρά.

² Εἰρήνη may be either from εἰρω to join or εἶπω to say. Our word "peace" is the Latin pax through the French paix.

II

JOY IN PRAYER (Philippians 1 : 3-11.)

JOY is the key-note of Philippians. Here we see Paul's joy in prayer. It is a noble gift, this exultation and exaltation in prayer. The men of a former generation spoke of "liberty" in prayer. There is no higher spiritual exercise than this and it comes only from long practice. The Philippians knew of this trait of Paul, for in prison there he and Silas "were praying and singing hymns unto God"¹ (Acts 16 : 25). Rainy ("Expositor's Bible") calls this prayer "The Apostle's Mind about the Philippians." It is that, but it is his mind in prayer, a summary of his constant prayer for them, the deepest desires of his heart about them, the highest hopes he has for them. There are delightful words here that linger in the mind.

I. Memory (verse 3).

"Upon all my remembrance of you." The words could mean "upon all your remembrance of me," but the other is probably the idea. It cannot² be ¹ προσευχόμενοι ὕμνουσιν τὸν θεόν. Almost as if the prayer was a song.

² Because of πάσῃ τῇ μνησίᾳ (the article). Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research," pp. 769 f.

“upon every remembrance.” Paul is not thinking of isolated memories of Philippi, but of the total picture that is still vivid in his mind. There were unpleasant memories of Philippi if he cared to dwell upon them, the rage of the masters of the poor girl whom Paul set free and the conduct of the magistrates and the populace towards Paul. But these were not part of the flock in Philippi. Even there Paul knows of unpleasantness between two women (Phil. 4 : 2 f.) and of others who seek their own desires (3 : 17). But time and distance mellow one’s memories in a gracious way, particularly in the case of an old pastor who no longer feels the petty irritations that once were so keen. Fortunately also the people forget their grudges against the pastor, now that he is gone. Paul will not allow specks to spoil the whole. So he meditates upon the names and faces of the saints at Philippi with his marvellous faculty for recalling them, happy trait for any preacher who can thus bind people to him. Time blurs names and faces for most of us, but Paul has zest in the life of people. He is fond of folks and joys in them through the haze of the past, in all of them. Indeed, it almost sounds as if Paul did nothing else but dream about the Philippians, “always in every supplication.”¹ Memories of his work all over the world came to him often in moments of despair and of cheer ¹He plays upon the word “all” : πάσῃ πάντοτε, πάσῃ πάντων.

(cf. 2 Cor. 11). These hallowed associations with the elect of earth spur one on to fresh endeavour. One feeds upon rich experiences of grace, like those at Northfield, and can go in the strength of this meat for many days.

2. Gratitude (verse 3).

Gratitude springs out of memory, bubbling up like a fountain. His feeling of gratitude¹ rests upon² the happy and holy memories of his days with the Philippians and their kindness to him. Paul always has something to thank God for in the churches to which he writes, save in the case of the Galatians, whose sudden defection shocked him severely. Even in Corinth he finds much to praise. Paul is a man of prayer and gratitude to God is an essential element in real prayer. "The great people of the earth to-day are the people of prayer. The greatest force of the day is prayer" (Baskerville, "Sidelights on the Epistle to the Philippians," p. 6). But nowhere is Paul in more grateful mood than in this Epistle of joy and suffering. He "dwells long and fondly on the subject" (Lightfoot, in loco). The Western text' makes Paul emphatic in the assertion of his gratitude, suggesting that the Philippians had written Paul a letter with the gifts which Epaphroditus brought. Perhaps also they may have imagined a slight lack of cordiality on Paul's part (Kennedy, in loco), because some time had elapsed with no word of appreciation from him. But the sickness of Epaphroditus explains his delay and he repeats his gratitude with emphasis. One of the common faults of men is failure to express gratitude for the simple courtesies and favours of life. It costs little to say "Thank you," and this word smooths out many wrinkles of care. Paul certainly had not meant to be derelict in this grace and amply atones for his apparent neglect by this beautiful Epistle which is a model of Christian courtesy. His gratitude is in no sense the Frenchman's definition, a lively sense of favours expected. This notion is repellent to Paul (Phil. 4: 17). It must be admitted that many a life is embittered by lack of gratitude and appreciation on the part of those who matter most.

¹ εὐχαριστέω is condemned by the Atticists, but is good Koine and occurs in the papyri (Deissmann, "Bible Studies," p. 122) and from Polybius on. The vulgate gratias ago is a good deal like εὐχαριστός (from εὖ and χαρίζομαι).

² ἐπὶ here in a semi-local (Ellicott) or ethico-local (Kennedy) sense.

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child."

3. Supplication (verse 4).

But Paul was not content with their spiritual state, many as were the grounds of thanksgiving. A holy discontent and high ambition for them led him to pe-

¹ DEFG defg have ἐγὼ μὲν.

tionary¹ prayer. One cannot well be in the presence of God without a sense of need. The words in this verse can be variously punctuated, but they probably go together as a single thought with its studied repetition of the word all (Lightfoot, in loco). One's mood in prayer varies according to the subject of the prayer. Here the Apostle prays "with joy,"² "with a sense of joy" (Moffatt). This note is the undertone of the whole³ Epistle and sounds on through Paul's petition for them which partakes of the nature of a spiritual rhapsody. Christians often show emotion in prayer. Sometimes uncontrolled passion sweeps them away. At times feeling seems to be without thought and merely incoherent ecstasy or even worked-up artificiality as in some shouting, the "holy laugh," the "holy rollers" and similar performances. But dead formalism has little right to find fault with such excesses. With Paul joyful prayer is the normal atmosphere of his life with God. He had a "hallelujah chorus" in his heart. Christ to Paul was the spring of all joy. He could not be a pessimist. He was not a blind optimist. Joy is not mere excitement, not mere noise, but serenity of spirit that overcomes circumstance. His

¹ δέησις (twice in this verse) is, like εὐχαριστία, just one aspect of προσευχή (general prayer) addressed only to God, though δέησις, from δέομαι to need or to beg, is to God or man.

² μετὰ χαρᾶς.

³ Summa epistolæ (Bengel).

“ buoyant spirit can prevail
Where common cheerfulness would fail.”

The happiest man in Rome is Paul the prisoner for Christ. Joy is the missing note in many lives which are too easily upset by the little worries. The little foxes eat away the vines. Christianity will have more power when it recovers joyful prayer, jubilant praying, mighty wrestling with God. Baskerville justly says that we need a revival in our prayer-life: “ Prayer may well be regarded as the line of communication with the base of supplies.” We have let the stream get choked from this fountain of life. If we lay hold on God with great energy, we shall have power with men.

4. Partnership (verse 5).

Partnership is one of the grounds¹ of Paul's thanksgiving about the Philippians. It is their partnership² or fellowship with Paul in the furtherance of the Gospel.³ The specific reference is to the contributions made by this church “ from the first day until now,”⁴ to Thessalonica and to Corinth at the very start of the church's life (Phil. 4: 15 f.). At first they stood alone in this cordial support of Paul's

¹ ἐπὶ.

² τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν (subjective genitive), from the adjective κοινός (in common). The word κοινωνία is used in the papyri of the marriage contract as well as of commercial partnership, a life-partnership βίου κοινωνία.

³ εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. Note this use of εἰς.

⁴ ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης ἡμέρας ἄχρι τοῦ νῦν.

missionary labours, though others later followed this noble example (2 Cor. 11:8). The Philippian church was thus a missionary church from the start. The word here for fellowship means coöperation in the largest sense, though the particular application is to their help to Paul in the work. James and John were partners¹ with Simon in the fishing. Titus was Paul's partner (2 Cor. 8:23). Paul uses this word for partnership on the part of the Philippians in the collection for the poor saints in Jerusalem (2 Cor. 8:4). The Philippians gave themselves to the mission cause heart and soul (Rainy, in loco). Here was one church to which Paul could always turn, upon whom he could always count for sympathy and support. It is just the lack of this sense of fellowship and of responsibility that makes so many Christians ineffective and useless in aggressive work. After Pentecost the Jerusalem Christians continued steadfastly in this fellowship or partnership (Acts 2:42). This mutual bond of spiritual commerce should bind together with hooks of steel people and pastor and make the church glad to remunerate properly both pastor and missionary (Gal. 6:6). It is the great distinction of the Philippian church that they had enlightenment enough to see their opportunity as co-workers with Paul in the greatest enterprise of the ages. They were only too glad of the chance of taking stock in this chief business of the world.

¹ κοινωνοί (Luke 5:10).

Coöperation is still the great demand among modern Christians. Churches so often leave it all for the pastor to do. The forces of righteousness in our cities so easily disintegrate and fly apart. We have a common salvation, a common task, a common peril, and a common Captain of our salvation. When Christians, with frank recognition of their differences of standpoint and convictions, learn to pull together in all common interests against Satan, we shall see the beginning of the end of his dominion among men. But we have not even learned how to enlist all those in one denomination in any common cause.

5. Confidence (verses 6 and 7).

Paul's state of confidence ¹ grew out of his experience with God and his knowledge of them. Paul places God first always. God began ² a good work in them, took the initiative as He always does. God will also perfect ³ it, carry it on to perfection, will not take His hand from the task till the day of Jesus Christ, the day of consummation. God "will go on completing it" (Moffatt). Paul is cheered by the hope of the Parousia or Second Coming of Christ, though he sets no day for it. He nowhere says that it will be before his death, and in this very Epistle he faces his own death as a real problem (1 : 21 ff.). Paul does, however, maintain an expectant attitude towards the return of Christ, and the hope has a moulding influence on his life. It is a pity that so many modern Christians have lost any real joy in this blessed hope and no longer look for the coming of Jesus to claim His own. Some, indeed, go to the other extreme and have formal programs and details and even dates for the Parousia. One can admire Paul's sanity and balance on this subject as on all others that he discusses. He counts it right¹ to have the opinion about the Philippians that he cherishes. This church was good soil, no doubt, and good seed was sown there, and good cultivation was kept up also. But the reason here given for Paul's optimism is that he holds them in his heart. Interestingly enough the phrase in the Greek² can mean "because you hold me in your heart." Both things are true, but Paul is speaking of his own love for his children in the Gospel. He was bound to believe the best about them. He has the shepherd heart and grounds his confidence in his own love as well as in God's purposes about them. The Philippians have shown the grace of continuance. They are not quitters. They press on both in the defense³ and in the confirmation of the Gospel. There are so many unfinished books, pictures, sculpture, buildings. It is a joy to see a church carry a thing through as they are doing. This is like God whose work is thorough (Baskerville). Hence Paul is proud to have the Philippians co-partners¹ with him in grace, in all the rich grace in Christ. They all share to the full with² Paul. He claims no clerical grace above them. They are fellows in Christ Jesus. It does Paul good to brood over this noble band of brothers linked together in the mystic bond of love for God and man, linked not merely in idea and theory, but in actual practice. If all churches of Christ lived up to this ideal, there would be no need and no room for any other brotherhoods, much good as many of them do. The church would fill all the life to the full.

¹ πεποιθώς, second perfect participle.

² ὁ ἐναρξάμενος.

³ ἐπιτελέσει linear future.

¹ δίκαιον (justum, Vg.). Right here, not righteous.

² διὰ τὸ ἔχειν με ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶν. Here καρδία includes the purposes of the will as well as the emotions.

³ ἀπολογία is used of defense in a judicial action.

6. Longing (verse 8).

Paul uses a very strong word³ here, a word of intense feeling and yearning, sometimes transliterated as pothos.⁴ The solemn oath here adds to the emotion. Paul calls God to witness in no light or flip-pant way (cf. Rom. 1: 9-11). But Paul actually says that he longs after them in the tender mercies⁵ of

¹ συνκοινωνοὺς μου τῆς χάριτος.

² συν.

³ ἐπιποθῶ.

⁴ We cannot press the force of the compound ἐπι- in the κοινή.

⁵ σπλάγχνα is used for the nobler viscera (heart, liver, lungs, etc.), as opposed to the ἔντερα (lower intestines). It occurs in the papyri in sense of pity ὑπὲρ σπλάγχνου "for pity's sake" (BU 1139¹⁷, V. B. C.), Moulton and Milligan, "Lexical Notes from the Papyri," Expositor, June, 1911.

Jesus Christ, with all the heart-hunger of Jesus Himself. The ancient Greeks located the emotions of love, pity, joy, etc., in the "stomach-brain," as it is sometimes called. This word is used about Philemon, "my very heart"¹ (Phile. 12). Paul longs for the Philippians, not only with the best of his own heart but in mystic union with Christ with the very heart-throb of Jesus Himself. He identifies his own heart-life with that of Christ. Paul, though a man of tremendous intellectual power, was even more a man of heart. He was a spiritual dynamo for Christ, a sort of electric battery, charged with the love of Christ.

7. Discerning Love (verses 9-10^a).

Petition (cf. 1 : 4) is now the form of Paul's prayer, petition closely connected with the gratitude already so richly expressed. Paul's prayers for the Christians are very suggestive. They are never perfunctory but always pertinent to the situation. "Prayer makes the preacher a heart-preacher. Prayer puts the preacher's heart into the preacher's sermon. Prayer puts the preacher's sermon into the preacher's heart" (Baskerville, in loco). This prayer has the very breath of heaven. Paul prays for the overflow²

¹ τὰ ἐμὰ σπλάγχνα.

² περισσεύη (cf. περισσός from περί). In ancient Greek this word meant to remain over. It is common in the Septuagint. Paul uses it commonly for "abound" (Vg. here abundet). Cf. Thomas, "The Prayers of St. Paul."

of the love¹ of the Philippians for one another and for himself. There is no danger of an excess. There is still room, "yet more and more,"² Paul pleads with his fondness for piling up adverbs. Some coldly critical people dislike exuberance in Christian affection, but Paul sets no limit³ to the development and expression of love except "in knowledge and all discernment,"⁴ "all manner of insight" (Moffatt), a very important qualification. Love must not be a raging flood like that in the Miami Valley that threatened the very existence of Dayton and other cities. It is a flood of love that Paul prays for and yet a flood within the bounds of good sense and discretion. He wishes that "the sensitiveness of touch may be added to love" (Kennedy, in loco). There should be sense in love and not blind impulse. Enthusiasm needs common sense for poise and guidance. What we call common sense is sense about common things, and is itself an uncommon quality. The flood is good if we know how to use it or to ride it. Love grows best in the full light of knowledge.⁵ Love has

¹ ἀγάπη is a "back-formation" from ἀγαπάω. There is one doubtful example of ἀγάπη in a Herculanum papyrus (i. B. C.) διὰ ἀ[γ]άπης ἐ[ναρ]γούς. The verb ἀγαπάω in the New Testament is a deeper and richer word than φιλέω which is more human (Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary").

² ἔτι μᾶλλον καὶ μᾶλλον.

³ Paul here uses the tense for durative action (περισσείη).

⁴ ἐν ἐπιγνώσει καὶ πάσῃ αἰσθήσει. Vg. has in scientia, et in omni sensu.

⁵ Paul is fond of ἐπίγνωσις which is added (ἐπι-) knowledge.

nothing to fear from the light. Suspicion kills love. "Perfect love casts out fear" (1 John 4:18). Intense love makes people hypersensitive to slights and misunderstandings unless one is quick to apply full knowledge to the situation. The word "discernment"¹ calls for the practical application of this spiritual insight and sensitiveness. This word denotes the fineness of spiritual perception that comes from alertness and practice. Hippocrates,² a medical writer, employs the verb for perception with sight, touch, hearing, the nose, the tongue, and knowledge. The word suggests the nervous organism of the body, all the avenues of approach by the senses of the mind, that wonderful sensitive plate, more delicate than any seismograph for recording earthquake shocks, or than any chemical apparatus for detecting affinities between atoms, or than any electrical machinery for noting the behaviour of electrons. Wireless telegraphy requires apparatus for sending and receiving the sound-waves. We give various names to this ethical sensitiveness like tact, spiritual sensibility, a trained conscience. One is reminded of the phrase in Hebrews 5 : 14 " who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil," trained like athletes¹ " to discriminate between good and evil."² Sin blunts the moral sense and blurs the spiritual vision so that the eyes of the heart do not see correctly. Paul's wish about the saints at Philippi is that they may be in a position³ where they can "approve the things that are excellent,"⁴ "have a sense of what is vital" (Moffatt). This is one of the translations of this expression and probably what Paul really means here. But the original idea is "to test the things that differ." The word for "excellent"⁵ means to "bear apart" either in hostility or superiority. By comparison or examination⁶ as in the testing of metals one learns wherein they differ and which is superior and at what points. Thus one is prepared intelligently to approve⁷ the excellent. It is only when one has his ethical sense quickened and has also full knowledge of the facts that he is able to render a sound judgment on

See its intensive force in 1 Corinthians 13:12. Cf. Epictetus II, 20, 21 ἐπίγνωσις τῆς ἀληθείας.

¹ αἰσθησις. Here only in the New Testament, but in Proverbs 1:4, 7, 22, etc. Cf. εἰς αἰσθησιν τοῦ κακοῦ in Epictetus II, 18, 8. In Hebrews 5:14 note αἰσθητήρια for the organs of moral sense (Lightfoot).

² De Off. Med. 3 (quoted by Kennedy, in loco) ἃ καὶ τῇ ὄφει καὶ καὶ τῇ ἀφῇ καὶ τῇ ἀκουῇ καὶ τῇ ῥινὶ καὶ τῇ γλώσσῃ καὶ τῇ γνῶμῃ ἔστιν αἰσθῆθαι.

¹ γεγυμνασμένα. Perfect tense, state of readiness.

² πρὸς διάκρισιν καλοῦ τε καὶ κακοῦ.

³ εἰς τὸ with the infinitive. Probably purpose though contemplated result is possible.

⁴ δοκαμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα.

⁵ διαφέροντα neuter plural participle from διαφέρω.

⁶ δοκιμάζειν. Very common in this sense in the papyri. It is used for assaying metals as in Proverbs 8 : 10 ; 17 : 3.

⁷ The papyri have this sense also. Cf. ὁ ποτέρως οὖν καὶ σὺ δοκιμάξεις, P. Pap. III. 41 (quoted by Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary").

matters of right and wrong. When the ethical sense is dulled by misuse or blinded by misinformation or prejudice, its decisions cannot be trusted. So the good is the enemy of the best. One cannot be satisfied with what is "good enough" for others. Few things are more needed by modern Christians than precisely this intelligent moral insight mingled with a wealth of love. It is needed to keep us from failure to see sin. We need it to help us to see spiritual opportunity and privilege. We need it to enable us to see what things are relatively the most important and to put the emphasis in the right place. We need it to keep us from becoming the dupes of slick-tongued adventurers and religious mountebanks. We need it to shield us from being ourselves the victims of religious prejudice and narrowness. It is the only combination that insures loyalty to truth with progress in grace and service. God give us all discerning love.

8. Fruit (1 : 10^b-11).

Paul has a series¹ of requests in this prayer, each a link in the chain. He prays for abounding and discerning love, that the Philippians may be drawn to the highest and the best, that in² the day of Christ

¹ ἵνα, εἰς τό, ἵνα (verses 9-11), each dependent on the other, the two last of an exegetical nature.

² εἰς ἡμέραν Χριστοῦ. Literally in or for the day of Christ, the Parousia. Cf. Phil. 2 : 16 ; Eph. 4 : 30 ; 2 Tim. 1 : 12. Vg. has in diem Christi.

they may pass under the eye of the Judge with approval. The goal of Paul in his work is the Day of Assizes when Jesus comes to judge. Then he wishes the Philippians to be sincere.¹ The old etymology² (T. H. Green quoted by Kennedy, in loco) defines the word as "perfect openness towards God." Plato uses the word for pure intellect, for the soul purged from sense. Certainly the eye of Him with whom we have to do sees us as we are (Heb. 4:12 f.). He is the God of things as they are. But Paul prays also that the Philippians may be "void of offence," a possible translation. The word is either intransitive as in Acts 24:16 and means "not stumbling" or transitive as in 1 Cor. 10:32 and means "not causing others to stumble." Either will make good sense here, for Jesus (cf. Matt. 25:31-46) mentions our treatment of others as one of the tests of character on the Judgment Day. But Paul is not satisfied with a negative statement of goodness. He adds a prayer for "the fruit of righteousness," "that harvest of righteousness" (Moffatt), for a full³ crop on a fruitful tree (cf. Ps. 1; Prov. 11:30). In the

¹ εἰλικρινεῖς. Unmixed, pure, unsullied. Vg. sinceri.

² From κρίνω and εἶλη (heat of sun) tested by sunbeams or εἶλη separated into ranks is very doubtful. The word is common enough, though the etymology is unknown. Cf. 1 Cor. 5:8; 2 Cor. 1:12 for εἰλικρίνεια. Light would be invisible apart from obstructions against which it strikes.

³ πεπληρωμένοι. Perfect passive, state of completion. Note the accusative καρπὸν.

Sermon on the Mount Jesus gave fruit as the proof of one's sincerity in God's service. "By their fruits ye shall know them" (Matt. 7: 16). The figure is common enough in all ages. Paul adds that this fruit of righteousness comes only through Jesus Christ.¹ The Pharisees did not possess it according to the indictment of Jesus in Matthew 6 and 23. Jesus is the vine on which this fruit grows (cf. John 15: 1-8). Paul closes his prayer with the purpose of this glorious fruitage, "unto the glory and praise of God." The fruit is not for the glory of the Philippians nor for the honour of Paul. Redemption has its origin in God and its end in God. "For of him, and through him, and unto him are all things. To him be the glory for ever. Amen" (Rom. 11: 36). The word for glory² originally meant opinion. But in the Septuagint it is used for the glory of the Lord, for the Shekinah. This is the conception here. The word had a popular sense also like our glory.³ Paul means that men will be led to praise God because good fruit is found in our lives.

¹ τὸν διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Note the added article to the attributive clause.

² δόξα from δοκέω.

³ Cf. δόξα πόλεως of the prytanis in P. Oxy. I. 41, 4 (iii, iv, A. D.) quoted by Moulton and Milligan's "Vocabulary."

III

GOOD OUT OF ILL

(I : 12-20)

THE interpretation of Providence is not always easy if one looks at the whole problem. There are always glib interpreters, like Job's miserable comforters, who know how to fit the cap to others with complete satisfaction to themselves. Modern science has thrown the chill of doubt over many of those who find refuge in the love of a personal God, our Heavenly Father. It is grim comfort to find consolation only in the certain operation of inexorable law. Our problem is to be able to see the hand of God in a world of law and order when things go against us. Paul was able to get sweet out of bitter. It is easier to see the good after it has come out of the ill. But it would be a dreary world if one could not believe that God cares for His people and overrules the evils of life for the progress of man and of men.

1. Progress of the Gospel (verse 12).

It is possible that Epaphroditus brought a letter to Paul from the Philippian church which was full of concern for Paul's welfare. He had been a prisoner for some years now, two at Cæsarea and one or two in Rome. Kennedy raises the question whether Paul may not have been by this time transferred from his hired lodging (Acts 28 : 30) to the castra perigrinorum where provincial prisoners were kept in military custody. If so, the Philippians would naturally expect Paul to have a harder time than he had so far experienced in Rome. At any rate Paul is anxious¹ for them to know the true state of the case about his affairs.² Paul tells of his experiences in Rome because only thus can he relieve their anxiety. There are two extremes in this matter. Some men talk too much about themselves and some do it too little. The use of "rather"³ clearly implies that the Philippians had expected the worst for Paul. He hastens to tell them that he has good news, not bad news, about the progress of the Gospel in Rome. The word for progress⁴ seems to mean cutting a way ahead, blazing a trail before an army to come afterwards. The pioneers, like Daniel Boone in Ken-

¹ The idiom γνώσκειν δὲ ὑμῶς βούλομαι occurs only here in the New Testament, but is like Paul's common θέλω with the infinitive (1 Cor. 10 : 1 ; 11 : 3 ; Col. 2 : 1 ; Rom. 1 : 13). It is a common epistolary phrase (Kennedy).

² τὰ κατ' ἐμέ. This use of κατά is almost equivalent to the genitive in the κοινῇ. Cf. Kæker, "Questiones de elocutione Polybiana," p. 282. Cf. Eph. 6 : 21 ; Col. 4 : 7.

³ μᾶλλον. Comparative without standard of comparison as in Phil. 2 : 26 ; 1 Cor. 7 : 38 ; 2 Cor. 7 : 7 ; Rom. 15 : 15. "Really tended to advance the Gospel" (Moffatt).

⁴ προκοπή. Cf. 1 : 25 ; 1 Tim. 4 : 15. Common in the later Greek. From προκόπτω, to cut forward.

tucky, blazed the path for civilization and Christianity. In the Stoic philosophy (Zeller, "Stoics," p. 294) the word is used for progress towards wisdom. Paul uses it for the progress of a young minister in culture and power (1 Tim. 4: 15). So then the opposition to Paul in Rome has kicked the Gospel upstairs. The Jews from Asia did not stop the onward march of the Gospel when they raised their hue and cry in the temple in Jerusalem. The hand of God was with Paul when he was at the mercy of the mob and before the Sanhedrin. Even Felix and Festus did not stay God's arm. In spite of shipwreck and delay on the part of Nero work has gone on. Paul had not courted imprisonment, but he does not fret unduly because of his chain. This very chain has been used of God to spread the Gospel.

2. Sermons in Bonds (verse 13).

The precise way in which good has come out of ill Paul goes on to show in an explanatory clause of result.¹ Paul's bonds² are literal bonds, for he was constantly chained to a Roman soldier (cf. Acts 28: 20). He probably means to say that his bonds have become manifest in Christ.³ It has become plain that he is a prisoner for no crime, but solely for Christ's sake, so that Paul can properly call himself "the prisoner of Christ" ¹ (Eph. 3 : 1). This fact attracted attention to Christ and gave Paul a fresh opportunity to preach Christ to those interested. Paul is never ashamed of Christ. He is not ashamed of his bonds. They become a badge of honour for they come to preach Christ to all who see them and who know why he wears them. In particular Paul has a fresh opportunity each day with the guard to whom he is chained. The soldiers relieved each other. He not only talks to this guard about his armour (cf. Eph. 6 : 10-20) and his service, but he tells him of Jesus. By this means alone the knowledge of Jesus would be conveyed to many. But Paul insists that the Gospel by means of his bonds has become known "throughout the whole prætorian guard." ² The expression is ambiguous in the Greek and can be interpreted in four different ways. It may mean the ten thousand picked soldiers who formed this notable guard. It may be the barracks where the guard were stationed in Rome. It may refer to the imperial palace as it is used of the governor's palace in the provinces (cf. Matt. 27 : 27 ; John 18 : 28, 33). It may refer to the judicial authorities of the imperial court. There seems to be no way of determining the matter finally, for good arguments are adduced for each meaning.¹ We know that there were converts in Cæsar's household (Phil. 4: 22), though this fact does not prove that Paul himself had access to the emperor's palace. There were Jews connected with the household of Nero (his wife Poppæa, for instance). The Christians there probably were slaves or other menials. It is possible that Paul was removed to the prætorian camp (castra prætoriana) and thus had ready access to the whole guard. But if not, he was still able slowly to spread the knowledge of Jesus through this famous band of soldiers. He would probably make visits to the camp with his guard who went with him from his lodging. In a way, therefore, Paul became the friend and chaplain of these soldiers. Mithraism was already beginning to get a powerful hold upon the Roman soldiers² and Paul would not be slow to seize the opportunity to counteract this influence and to tell the men about Jesus. The Roman soldier probably took kindly to Paul (cf. the centurion Julius in Acts 27: 3 who treated Paul "kindly"³). Certainly Paul had a manly message to present. He is manifestly proud of the fact that he has set all the prætorian guard, almost the flower of the Roman army, to thinking and to talking about Jesus. Preaching to soldiers has always appealed to strong preachers.⁴ The shadow

¹ ὥστε—γενέσθαι καὶ—τολμᾶν. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research," pp. 999 f.

² δεσμούς. Δεσμά (cf. Luke 8: 29) is more common, but no real distinction is traceable.

³ ἐν Χριστῷ γενέσθαι. Position is ambiguous, but Vg. has manifesta fierent in Christo.

¹ ὁ δέσμιος τοῦ Χριστοῦ.

² ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ. Vg. has in omni prætorio.

¹ See Kennedy, in loco.

² Cf. Kennedy, "St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions."

³ φιλανθρωπῶς.

⁴ Cf. Broadus in Lee's Army (Robertson, "Life and Letters of death in the battle of to-morrow brings the message close home to strong men's hearts. One is able to preach as a "dying man to dying men." Whether Paul was able to address the soldiers in large companies in formal sermons we do not know, but he was able to make skillful use of conversation. These rough and ready men of affairs saw the steady joy of Paul the prisoner. They watched him day by day and his buoyant optimism caught their fancy. Jesus is the secret of Paul's life of joy. Thus the contagion of Paul's love for Jesus spread to "all the rest," whether to soldiers, or to people in Rome it is not clear. He had spoken to the Jews we know (Acts 28 : 17, 23). There was much in the soldier's life that appealed to Paul's heroic nature and he drew frequent illustrations from the life of the soldier.

3. Spurring Others to Action (verse 14).

This is the second result of Paul's imprisonment in Rome. There are always timid souls who lose heart in times of persecution. Some even go to the extent of apostasy when the cause seems lost. The early Christian centuries furnish examples of those who renounced Christ for Cæsar under the pressure of the Roman state (cf. 1 Cor. 12 : 1-3). Paul had long foreseen the coming conflict between Christianity and the Man of Sin or Lawlessness embodied in of John A. Broadus," pp. 198-209 ; Jones, "Christ in the Camp," pp. 312-326) ; and the opportunity during the Great War.

the Roman Empire (2 Thess. 2:3-12). Here in Rome itself that dark shadow loomed blacker than ever in spite of the fact that Nero had not yet come out openly against Christianity. The faint-hearted in Rome knew the power of the state. Paul was a prisoner and the outcome was uncertain. These fearful saints would take no chances. There was a minority of the brethren in Rome who exercised extra caution because of Paul's activity for Christ. They wished no responsibility for his conduct if things went against him. There are always these shirkers who practise absenteeism from church in times of struggle, these cowards in a crisis who slink away till danger is past. They come in for the shouting after victory is won. In case of disaster they are ready to say: "We told you so." But "the most of the brethren"¹ constituted that inner circle of the brotherhood that does and dares things for Christ while the rest hang back. Paul was lucky to have won a majority to this scale of activity. It is usually the minority of Christians who put energy into the work while the majority drift along or criticize what the minority do. The papyri² give plenty of examples of "brothers" in the sense of "fellows"

¹ τοὺς πλείονας τῶν ἀδελφῶν. The comparative can thus be translated. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 668.

² Thus a town clerk calls another ἀδελφός, P. Tebt. I. 12 (B. C. 118), members of a burial club are so termed in P. Tor. I, 1. i. 20 (ii. B. C.). See Moulton and Milligan's "Vocabulary" for others.

in service or members of guilds or brotherhoods. Paul's courage and contagious enthusiasm had shamed many into action who had at first held back through fear or indifference. These gain confidence in the Lord, which is the probable¹ translation rather than "brethren in the Lord." This confidence in the Lord is caused by Paul's bonds.² Paul's chain rebuked their lethargy and cowardice and stirred the conscience so that they are now "bold to speak the word of God without fear."³ Manifestly they had been afraid to open their mouths for a while till they saw how brave Paul was in spite of his bondage and impending trial. Some, never eloquent before, now find tongues of angels as they catch the spirit of Paul. The bolder spirits are rendered "more abundantly"⁴ bold than they were before. These cast caution to the winds and are overwhelmingly daring in their championship of Jesus. They speak "the message of God," Paul's phrase here for preaching and telling the story of the gospel of grace. There are always in a crisis some choice spirits ready to die for Christ like the ten thousand native Chinese Christians who at the time of the Boxer movement died rather than renounce Jesus. Fortitude is con-

¹ ἐν κυρίῳ πεπεθοίτας. Cf. Phil. 2:24; Gal. 5:10; 2 Thess. 3:4. The order here is different, but that is not a material point.

² τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου. Instrumental case.

³ τολμᾶν τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ ἀφόβως.

⁴ περισσοτέρως.

tagious. Paul's courage was like that of a brave general leading his troops. There is nothing that will quicken a dying church into life like courage on the part of the leaders. Prophets to-day have to call to the dry bones to live. Paul waked up the church in Rome by going ahead in spite of his limitations and doing his duty boldly as opportunity came to him. It is a great achievement to revive a dead church. There are plenty of them dead or dying or asleep. Much of the pastor's energy is required to keep his church awake or to wake it up. It is not enough to galvanize a corpse. Life must come back into the body. This is no artificial or mechanical process. Paul did his own part heroically. That is the way to wake up our churches. Let each one lay hold of his own task. That is better than conventions or conferences or resolutions. Life is more contagious than death. Life can put death to flight if it is given a fair chance. "And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord" (Ps. 40: 3).

4. Preaching Christ from Envy of Paul (verses 15,^a 17).

But Paul had no bed of roses in Rome. The minority furnished plenty of thorns for his side. Some ¹ of these were provoked by Paul's activity, it is true, to preach¹ Christ, but they did it "even of envy and strife,"² pitiful enough motives for Christian zeal. Envy³ is a powerful motive in human life. It played its part in the trial and death of Jesus (Matt. 27:18). There is a personal side to this preaching which is as much against Paul as in favour of Christ (cf. Eph. 2:4). Kennedy pleads for "rivalry"⁴ rather than "strife" in this passage and the word often has this sense. Envy and rivalry often lead to open strife. We do not, indeed, know to what class of teachers Paul refers. It may be some of the old teachers of the church in Rome who do not relish Paul's leadership since it displaces them, a form of jealousy that one sees only too often. In that case their fresh activity would be with a view to regaining their former prestige and influence and partly by depreciating Paul.⁵ If it was not personal pique that stirred these men, they may have been Jewish Christians who disliked the note of universality in Paul's message and feared that he did not sufficiently guard the interests of Judaism.⁶ It may have been the Judaizers, Paul's old enemies who did him such harm in Jerusalem and Galatia and Corinth. This is the usual view since Bengel, but it is open to

¹ τινες μὲν. He does not define them.

¹ κηρύσσουσιν to herald Christ.

² καὶ διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν.

³ Philemon, a comic poet of B. C. 330, says: πολλά με διδάσκεις ἀφθόνως διὰ φθόνον. ⁴ For ἔριν.

⁵ Cf. Weiss, "Am. Journal of Theology," i. 2, pp. 388-389.

⁶ Cf. McGiffert, "Apostolic Age," pp. 393-395.

the objection that Paul here apparently condones their preaching. That, however, is not quite true, as we shall see. We do not, indeed, know that the Judaizers had reached Rome, though there is no inherent difficulty in that supposition. As a matter of fact, it is quite likely that all of these elements enter into the situation, for Paul expressly says that these men proclaimed¹ Christ from mixed motives, "not sincerely."² In fact, they preach from a partisan³ or selfish motive (cf. Gal. 5 : 20). It was primarily "labour for hire" (cf. Job 2 : 11) and the word was applied to those in official position who looked after their own selfish interests rather than the common good. Kennedy argues for "selfishness" as the meaning here. But, in any case, these selfish partisans cared as much for giving trouble to Paul as for preaching Christ. They thought⁴ that they were stirring up tribulation⁵ for Paul by making his chains gall him (Lightfoot). They found added zest in the thought that the growth of their peculiar type of Christian doctrine would irritate ("annoy," Moffatt) Paul. One must confess that some Christians seem to enjoy sticking pins in the preacher. It is possible

¹ καταγγέλλουσιν. A rather more formal word than κηρύσσω above.

² οὐχ ἀγνῶς. Cf. 2 Cor. 11 : 13, 20 for the charge of insincerity. So also in Gal. 6 : 22.

³ The word ἐριθία is from ἐριθός, a hired servant.

⁴ οἰόμενοι. Planning and thinking it out.

⁵ θλίψιν ἐγείρειν. As if from the dead.

for one to be more of a denominationalist than a Christian, to care more for the progress of one's special views than for the kingdom of God. There are ministers with small jealousies who wreck churches like a tornado with their winds of doctrine. Paul's very success makes these men in Rome jealous and resentful and determined to nag him if they cannot stop his onward march. These men feel that they are entitled to success as much as men less able who get ahead of them. So the destructive spirit eats its way into their hearts and lives. It was a pity that this spirit should burst forth against Paul in Rome at the time of the crisis in his imprisonment. But at such a time small men feel like taking advantage of such a situation and they strike Paul when he is a prisoner. Wolves turn and rend one of their own pack who falls in the fight. It is a small thing to try to undermine another preacher's power. One may wonder that God should bless at all the message of men with such a spirit. But after all we should be glad that our own wrong motives do not wholly hinder the reception of whatever truth is preached to men. The power is from God and not from the preacher, in God's message and not in the preacher's heart.

5. Preaching Christ from Love of Paul (verses 15,^b 16).

There is action and reaction in all things. The factionous opposition of the minority stimulated the majority to increased efforts out of love for Paul. They do it out of good-will¹ as well as love. There is this good that comes out of a church dissension. Some sluggish souls wake up and begin to take an interest in the affairs of the kingdom who had not done so before the disagreement arose. There is this consolation to be found in the midst of the bitter strife of the ages among various Christian sects which have often caused sadness. We can excuse much even of rancour in theological debates and wranglings over minor points because of the obvious sincerity and conviction of the disputants. We may rejoice in the larger spirit of charity now in the world with the hope for its increase provided the result is not a spineless uniformity without point or pith. Love calls for no sacrifice of principle. Love and good-will moved the majority to stand valiantly by the side of Paul in his exposition of spiritual Christianity. One can be a conscientious denominationalist to-day and full of love and the spirit of coöperation in all wise and proper ways. These men are active because of² good-will to Paul, and their zeal springs out of¹ love. Some even love Paul for the enemies that he has made, even among Christians, but most love him for his great achievements in Christ. When Paul is thus under attack in Rome, the faithful rally round him as the disciples did in a circle² at Lystra. They recognize³ Paul as "set for the defence of the Gospel."⁴ They rejoice in his courage in chains and take his view of his situation. His defence is an apology in the original force of the word (cf. 1:7). Paul is a living apologetic for Christ, a typical example of the word⁵ in Jude 3. To desert Paul at this juncture is to desert Christ. The cause of Christ is here identified with the cause of Paul, its leading exponent. The cause is crystallized in the man. One cannot stand by Christ in theory and leave Paul in the lurch in practice. Alas, so often church members fail to rally to the support of the pastor or of the denominational servants. They are willing to give up the preacher to save the cause as Caiaphas proposed about Jesus in John 11:50, voluntary offering of some one else as a sacrifice. Sometimes, to be sure, the minister is at fault and has to go for the good of all concerned. Christianity is incarnated in men and women. This fact gives dignity to the Christian's task, but it makes it imperative that one

¹ δι' ἐὺδοκίαν. This word (from εὖ and δοκέω) is used either for desire (Rom. 10 : 1) or satisfaction (2 Thess 1 : 11) as in the Father's good pleasure in Jesus (Matt. 3 : 17). The best manuscripts here in verse 16 give the order in the Revised Version which is a chiasm or cross reference to verse 15. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek N. T.," p. 1200.

² διὰ.

¹ ἐξ. ² κυκλωσάντων τῶν μαθητῶν (Acts 14:20).

³ εἰδότες.

⁴ εἰς ἀπολογίαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου κεῖμαι. The word κεῖμαι (positus sum, Vg.) means continued state like perfect of τίθημι.

⁵ ἐπαγωνίζεσθαι. To contend steadfastly.

shall be really doing the work of Christ if people are to suffer with him for Christ's sake. Else the very love of the people for the man and minister may lead many into the pit. The words of Jesus here are final: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me—Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of these least, ye did it not unto me" (Matt. 25 : 40, 45).

6. Paul's Conquering Joy (verse 18).

Nowhere does Paul appear to better advantage than in this verse. He faces frankly the limitations of ministers and men in the service of Christ, limitations in preacher and hearer. What is to be the attitude of the preacher towards other preachers who do not see things as he does in all points of Christian doctrine? This is a practical question and one that men must answer to-day. People are often diligent to stir up jealousy between preachers. The effort was made to make John the Baptist jealous of Jesus, but it failed miserably ¹ (John 3 : 22-29). There is joy enough for all the workers in the kingdom, the one who sows and the one who reaps (John 4 : 36-38). People criticize the preachers in the most inconsistent ways and it is hopeless to try to please them all. They found fault with John and with Jesus for directly opposite things (Luke 7 : 31-34).² It has been objected here that Paul seems to condone the errors of the Judaizers which he had so severely criticized in 2 Corinthians 10-13 and in Galatians. But this estimate fails to understand Paul's spirit here. He speaks out in Rome with the same courage and clearness as heretofore. He abates no whit his own convictions. But the issue before Paul is simply whether or not he is to spend his time railing at preachers who have the same right to preach as he has and give ground for charges of pique and jealousy besides filling the ears of the Roman soldiers with stories of the shortcomings of these envious preachers. He could have done that and angels would have wept and the ungodly would have sneered at this exhibition of so-called Christian love. Jealousy had found a place even in the ranks of the twelve apostles. Paul rises to the high plane of conquering joy in Christ. "What then?"¹ The answer of Paul is "only that,"² "in every way"³ or in any event "Christ is preached."⁴ This is what matters most. One must learn to see things as they are and to find the consolation in the big truths of life in spite of the minor drawbacks. The alternative here between pretense⁵

¹ Cf. Robertson, "John the Loyal," pp. 165 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 243 ff.

¹ τί γάρ. A common classical idiom. Cf. Rom. 3 : 3.

² πλὴν ὅτι. Undoubtedly the correct text.

³ παντὶ τρόπῳ.

⁴ Χριστὸς καταγγέλλεται. Linear present.

⁵ προφάσει. Our word "prophecy." It is the thing set forth, the alleged or face value of a statement, whether true or and truth¹ is a very common one. Some men were using the name of Christ as a cover or mask for personal and selfish ends (Vincent, in loco). We are shocked at that statement, and yet we may also thank God that He can use such poor preaching for His glory. God can even bless insincere preaching. Even hypocritical preaching, alas, can be blessed of God. Somehow God blesses the grain of truth that is mixed in with error and bad motives. He places no premium upon error or upon pretense. But Paul's problem is one of personal adjustment. Is he to embitter his own heart because all preachers of Christ are not pure? Far from it. He rather seizes upon the salient point in the situation. Christ is preached. This is what matters most. Other things are important in varying degrees, but this is primal. Paul knows how to put first things first and to keep them there. So he takes his stand. "And therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."² He does not rejoice in false preaching, but in the fact that even in such preaching Christ is found by souls that hunger after Him. Surely we can all rejoice that God does bless false. Here the contrast with truth shows the meaning to be pretext or pretense. Cf. 1 Thess. 2 : 5.

¹ ἀληθεία. The word means openness (ἀ privative and λαμβάνω to conceal, unconcealed), the very opposite of deceit.

² καὶ ἐν τούτῳ χαίρω ἀλλὰ καὶ χαρήσομαι. Note the affirmative use of ἀλλὰ here (Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek N. T. in the Light of Hist. Research," p. 1185). Note also the volitive linear future χαρήσομαι. Robertson, ibid., p. 889.

indifferent preaching. Over and above all the clangour of contending voices in modern Christendom rises the fact of Christ. It is Jesus that saves men from their sins. This is the universal note in the eternal Christ. We look at Him from different angles and with imperfect eyes and we tell what we see in broken speech, sometimes incoherent and contradictory. But, if by means of it, men see Jesus, it is worth while.

7. Christ Magnified in Paul (verses 19 and 20).

Paul now turns to his own case and declares that it matters little what happens to him in Rome. Already the imprisonment, as he has shown, has turned out for the progress of the Gospel. He is grateful for their prayers ("your supplication") and "for the supply" of the spirit of Jesus Christ" (both source and gift). Paul's attitude is measured by² the earnest expectation³ and hope that Christ shall be magnified⁴ now as always in his body. Whether this is by life or death is not material. If Christ is made great in the hearts and eyes of men it is a small matter what hap-

¹ ἐπιχορηγίας. A word used for the chorus leader who furnished entertainments for the chorus. Then for "supply" in general. Cf. 2 Pet. 1:5, 11. The verb ἐπιχορηγέω occurs in the papyri.

² κατὰ.

³ αποκαταδοκίαν. A very strong and striking word (cf. Rom. 8:19) used for intent watching with head bent or stretched in that direction. It occurs in the papyri of the expectation of peasants about the visit (παρουσία) of a high official.

⁴ μεγαλυνθήσεται. Made great.

pens to Paul. Then he shall not be put to shame¹ in anything. Hence Paul knows² that his present troubles will turn out³ at last for his eternal salvation,⁴ not merely rescue from imprisonment, for it applies (verse 20) both to death and life. He will get the spiritual development that God means for him to receive from his imprisonment and from the personal antagonisms in Rome. It is all one to Paul what the future holds in store for him on earth. He is sure of the prayers of the Philippians and of the presence of the Spirit of Jesus and of the triumph of Jesus in his work whether by life or death. So he faces the future with calmness whatever doubt as to the course of events may exist. As to that Paul is not sure of his own mind as he now proceeds to show.

¹ ἀσχυνθήσομαι.

² οἶδα. Intuitional conviction.

³ ἀποβήσεται. Go off at last in this direction.

⁴ σωτηρίαν.

IV

JOY IN DEATH AS WELL AS IN LIFE

(1 : 21-30)

PAUL'S indifference about his personal inconveniences and his confidence that Christ will be magnified in his body whether by life or by death (1 : 20) raise the whole question of what life is and what death is. Every one has to face this problem sooner or later. He must have his philosophy of life. The Stoics preached apathy as the triumph of the reason over the passions. But that cold and colourless creed is not for Paul's warm heart. He gives us in this paragraph his conception of real life, the life worth while. Kabisch,¹ it is true, affirms that with Paul life is simply existence and has no ethical quality, an inadequate interpretation of Paul's view in my opinion, though in verse 20 the contrast is between the present life and death.² He argues from this basis.³

1. The Gain of Death (verse 21).

Life has different senses and different standards.

¹ "Eschatologie des Paulus," p. 134.

² Cf. Kennedy, in loco.

³ γὰρ in verse 21.

Paul here announces the principle of life¹ so far as he is concerned. The personal pronoun has the emphatic place in the sentence.² It means more than in my opinion, but in my case, in my realization of life³ (Ellicott, in loco). This is what life means to me, whatever it means to others. With many life means pleasure, sensual indulgence, money, power, having one's way, flattery. But with Paul the regulative principle of life is Christ. Jesus had said that He was the life⁴ (John 11 : 25 ; 14 : 6) as well as the resurrection, the way, the truth. Jesus is the source of power in life in the cosmic sense of energy, in the moral sense of truth, in the practical sense of guide, and is the origin of spiritual vitality. So Baskerville ("Sidelights on Philippians," p. 25) says that "Christ Jesus must be the origin of life, the essence of life, the model of life, the aim of life, the solace of life, the reward of life." In Colossians 3 : 4, Paul speaks of "Christ our Life."⁵ But what Paul here affirms is not "Christ is life," but "living is Christ, and dying is gain."⁶ Paul does say in Galatians 2 : 20 : "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me."⁷ Christ has taken possession of Paul so ¹ τὸ ζῆν, not τὸ βιοῦν (manner of life). Elsewhere Paul has τὸ ζῆν for the process of life (verse 22 ; Rom. 8 : 12 ; 2 Cor. 1 : 8).

² Ἐμοὶ γὰρ τὸ ζῆν Χριστός.

³ The ethical dative.

⁴ ἡ ζωή.

⁵ Χριστός ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν.

⁶ This is plain from the use of the article with the infinitive and its absence with Χριστός and κέρδος.

⁷ ζῶ δὲ οὐκέτι ἐγώ, ζῆ δὲ ἐν ἐμοὶ Χριστός.

completely that Paul has lost his autonomy and willful independence of Christ. He is the glad slave of Christ. He "is crucified with Christ"¹ in spiritual identity. This is mysticism, but reality, the deepest reality of life for Paul, who has been initiated into the mystery of Christ (Col. 2 : 2). So then Paul is able to say that life with him has come to mean Christ, no less and no more. "To go on living"² means more of Christ, living the "Christ life" in the real sense of that term. Bengel³ has interpreted Paul thus : "Whatever I live, I live Christ." I live only to serve Christ and have no conception of life apart from Christ (Lightfoot). Christ occupies the whole of my life. I have no secrets apart from Him. I have no locked doors to keep Him out of any part of my life. Christ has full possession of myself. Paul's life is not on the bulk-head principle (Hutton). In a word, Paul leads a surrendered life and finds the utmost peace and power in it. It is the victorious life in the truest sense. Mere existence is not real life for Paul. He is not just marking time. Christ covers the entire horizon for Paul, the whole circumference of his interests. Christ fills all of Paul's eye. Christ is his all and in all. But then what about death? Simply more of Christ. That is all. "To die is gain." The word here for "gain"⁴

¹ Χριστῷ συνεσταύρωμαι.

² τὸ ζῆν (present and durative).

³ Quicquid vivo, Christum vivo.

⁴ κέρδος.

is used for interest, gains, profits. All that death¹ can do for Paul is to give him more of Christ. It will be like cashing in the principal and the interest. Then he will gain all of Christ. It is this idea that he has in mind in Philippians 3:8 when he speaks of "gaining Christ."² Paul feels like an eagle in a cage. Death will be his liberation from the limitations of the flesh. Death has no terrors for Paul (cf. Heb. 2:15). He looks upon death as a friend in disguise, the door to complete and glorious union with Christ. So then Paul is ready for death, but is not dissatisfied with life here.

2. The Quandary About Life (verses 21-24).

Paul faces life or death with equanimity. He is ready for either. He has shown that for him death means fuller and richer life in gaining Christ. But he is not discontented to live on in the flesh if that is the will of God. He adds "in the flesh" here because he has used "life" about death. Lightfoot quotes "the sublime guess" of Euripides:³ "Who knows if living is indeed dying, while dying is living." The comic poets ridiculed this saying of Euripides, but Christians have found it to be the truth in Christ. Verse 22 is capable of several translations. The most natural one is this: "But if life in the flesh (be my lot), this¹ (means) for me fruit of work." In this translation, the copula has to be supplied in both clauses; but this is no more difficult than to repeat the "if" with a dash after "flesh" or to make a question out of the first clause.² He is sure that if he is to live on in the flesh, it means that Christ has "fruit of work"³ for him, a beautiful phrase. Hence he does not complain in spite of the attractiveness of death for him with the glory of Jesus beckoning him on. So Paul goes on: "And (in that case, fruit of work in life in the flesh) what I shall choose I know not."⁴ There would be not a moment's hesitation with Paul if it were clear to him that his work was done. Just to eke out a useless existence has no charm for him. He does not wish to be like a fruit tree that no longer bears and only cumber the ground. He has no desire to be laid on the shelf, to be past the dead-line in the ministry. Paul had no friends to take care of his old age. One of the saddest of all spectacles is the sight of an old minister whom no one wishes to hear preach and who is no longer able to support himself.⁵ So then Paul

¹ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν here is the act of dying (aorist), not the process (present).

² ἵνα Χριστὸν κερδήσω.

³ τίς οἶδεν εἰ τὸ ζῆν μὲν ἔστιν κατθανεῖν τὸ κατθανεῖν δὲ ζῆν.

¹ τοῦτο here then refers to τὸ ζῆν.

² See Kennedy, Lightfoot, Vincent.

³ καρπὸς ἔργου. The very phrase occurs in Ps. 103 (104): 13.

⁴ καὶ τί αἰρήσομαι οὐ γινώσκω.

⁵ It is gratifying to note the efforts in the United States to raise adequate endowment funds to care for the aged servants of Christ who need help. They should be pensioned like old soldiers.

declines to commit himself in case there is still work for him to do. "I do not say."¹ But Paul has no hesitation in declaring his personal preference for death since that means the riches in Christ. But it seems clear to him that there is work for him yet and so he is "in a strait betwixt the two,"² life and death. Once elsewhere (2 Cor. 5 : 14) Paul uses this verb of the love of Christ that "constrains" him, holds him together. He is in a vise between these two conceptions. He is caught on the two horns of this dilemma. He has "the desire," the real longing of his soul, "to depart and be with Christ," to loosen his ship from her moorings and put out to sea on "the Great Adventure" of death which fascinates Paul, not by its uncertainty, but by the certainty of being with Jesus. He is not abashed by the thought that no traveller has ever returned from the other shore. He does not wish to return, but to go and to stay with Jesus. That will be glory for Paul. One may note here that Paul speaks as if he expected to be with Jesus at death without an interval. The word "depart"³ was variously used, for a ship's departure, for breaking up camp, and for death. Paul himself uses a similar word¹ for death under the figure of breaking up camp or striking a tent (2 Cor. 5 : 1). And in 2 Tim. 4 : 6 he speaks of his own death again with the same word² as here. Paul is willing to make an end of his tent life in the flesh, a stranger and a pilgrim on the earth like Abraham (Heb. 11 : 13). His Promised Land is beyond Jordan where Jesus is. He feels sure that for him this "is very far better," piling up comparatives,³ a triple superiority, to express the intensity of his feeling on the subject. But Paul does not take a selfish view of his life. He is willing to "abide by the flesh"⁴ since it is "more necessary for you."⁵ After all this is one of the chief joys of life to know that your life is necessary or useful for that of some one else. There is the pang of parting from loved ones here, the sorrow of leaving others without one's help, the shock of an incomplete task. So then Paul faces his work with joy, only he would have more joy to go to be with Jesus. But the hero is no shirker. He has kept to his task even though a prisoner for these five years.

¹ οὐ γινώσκω. The ancient meaning was I do not perceive, but in the New Testament it is as above (declare or say). In the papyri it is common in the sense of "recognize" or "identify." (Cf. Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary," etc.)

² συνέχομαι δὲ ἐκ τῶν δύο.

³ ἀναλῶσαι (loosen up). The intransitive sense of depart is common in Polybius and the papyri (Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary," etc.).

¹ καταλυθῆναι.

² ἀναλύσεως (cf. our analysis).

³ πολλῶ γὰρ μᾶλλον κρείσσον. This doubling or trebling (πολλῶ) of comparison is common enough in the κοινή. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research," pp. 663 f.

⁴ τὸ ἐπιμένειν δὲ τῇ σαρκί. So it is to be rendered rather than "in the flesh."

⁵ ἀναγκαιότερον δι' ὑμᾶς. Comparative again, a sort of momentum from the first clause.

3. The Reason for Longer Life (verses 25 f.).

Paul has no desire for longer life just to be alive, hanging on to the ragged edge of existence. To be sure, he does not advocate suicide. The matter is in God's hands and he would not have it otherwise. Old people can be very happy and very useful. If they become a problem, it is partly because they take a morose view of things. Even the sick bring a blessing, often just because they are sick and suffering. Robert Hall and Charles H. Spurgeon are instances of ministers who turned physical suffering to glorious gain. The same thing is true of Adèle Kamm, the wonderful invalid girl whose life blessed so many. Paul was already doing that very thing while a prisoner. Paul is not here claiming prophetic insight into the course of his career. He is confident¹ of this very hope of being useful to the Philippians. He uses the same word again in 2:24 about his plans. In Acts 20:25 Paul speaks of a presentiment² about not seeing the elders of Ephesus again, which apparently was not fulfilled (1 Tim. 1:3; 2 Tim. 1:15, 18; 4:20). But his personal conviction about seeing the Philippians again seems to have come true (1 Tim. 1:3). He plays on the Greek verb as he loves to do with words. It is all a mistake to think that such plays or puns are simply funny or idle conceits. "I know that I shall bide and abide with you all." ¹ The second word ² has in the later Greek the notion of remaining alive. So Paul expects to remain alive and to be with the Philippians again by God's favour "for your progress and joy in the faith." ³ He had spoken of "the progress of the Gospel" (1:12) in Rome in spite of his imprisonment, in fact largely because of it. Now he uses the same word about the progress of the Philippians. Joy will go along with progress in the faith. It is eminently worth while to see people make progress in the faith and to find joy in the faith. The preacher who sees people grow under his ministry has his reward here and now. So the people love to see the preacher grow in his insight and grasp of spiritual truth. There is joy, mutual joy, because of mutual progress, joy pari passu with the progress. Paul strikes again the triumphant victorious note in his message to the Philippians. There is no "hark-from-the-tomb religion" for him.

¹ τοῦτο πεποιθὼς. State of assurance.

² οἶδα. His intellectual conviction.

¹ μένω καὶ παραμένω πᾶσω ὑμῖν. The first verb is absolute (for life), the second is relative and particular with the dative, by the side of you all. Cf. Plato's Phædrus 115 D οὐδέ τι ὑμῖν παραμένω. The word is in common use for "serve" as an apprentice or slave-boy (Moulton and Milligan, "Lexical Notes in Papyri," Expositor, Sept. 1910). For other word-plays by Paul see 2 Thess. 3:11; Rom. 1:20; 5:19; 2 Cor. 4:8; 5:4. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar of the Greek New Testament," etc., pp. 1200 f.

² παραμένω. Cf. Schmid, "Atticismus," I, p. 132.

³ εἰς τὴν ὑμῶν προκοπὴν καὶ χαρὰν τῆς πίστεως. The one article goes with both substantives as in 2 Pet. 1:1 and 1:11. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," etc., p. 785.

The Christian ought to be the happiest man alive, full of spiritual ecstasy and rapture. Joy is more than Epicurean sensualism. Baskerville quotes the Yorkshireman who found so great joy in his religion that he had "A happy Monday. A blessed Tuesday. A joyful Wednesday. A delightful Thursday. A good Friday. A glorious Saturday. A heavenly Sunday." Indeed, Paul wishes that their "glorifying"¹ may literally overflow² all bounds, provided it is in Christ³ (because of Christ primarily and under the control of Christ, in the sphere of Christ). If people have enough occasion to shout aloud their joy, let them do it. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so. Sing aloud the praises of our God. The Philippians will have, so Paul hopes, a special occasion of joy in his case⁴ "through my presence⁵ with you again." He lives to serve and to give joy to others. That is his joy. Paul, like his Master, came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He is not a minister who has to be "mollycoddled," but a virile spirit radiating life and joy to all about him. The key-word to Paul's life is precisely the notion of service. There is no harm in a spiritual flood if it does not get beyond the sphere of Jesus Christ.

¹ καύχημα ground of boasting.

² περισσεύη. All around and over.

³ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.

⁴ ἐν ἐμοί.

⁵ διὰ τῆς ἐμῆς παρουσίας. Common in this sense of coming in the papyri. Cf. the Parousia of Christ.

4. The Christian as a Citizen (verses 27 f.).

Paul's coming to them cannot do it all. They must do their part if his coming is to be of any value to them. So he conditions¹ his hope of helping by a striking clause: "Only be citizens of the Christian commonwealth in a manner worthy of the Gospel of Christ." The Authorized Version preserves a curious mark of the inevitable change in words during the centuries for it has: "Only let your conversation, etc." In modern English "conversation" is confined to talk, whereas in old English it signified manner of life according to its etymology.² Christian conversation now means Christian talk. But the Revised Version has "manner of life" which is the old idea in "conversation." The Greek, however, has a more precise idea than that and gives the picture of a city-state or commonwealth, from which we get our words politic, political, polite.³ Paul uses the word once also of his life in good conscience before God.⁴ The Stoics had familiarized the public

¹ See a similar use of μόνον in 1 Cor. 7 : 39 ; Gal. 2 : 10 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 7.

² Conversatio from converso to turn round, then conversor to turn oneself, to live.

³ πολιτεύεσθε. Act your part as citizens. From πολίτης citizen, and that from πόλις city. Cf. Fowler, "The City-State of the Greeks and Romans" (1895); Coulanges, "The Ancient City" (1916). Cf. πολίτευμα in Phil. 3 : 20. Josephus ("Life," § 2) says ἡρξάμην πολιτεύεσθαι τῇ φαρισαίων αἵρεσει κατακολουθῶν. The Pharisees were both a political and a religious party.

⁴ πεπολίτευμαι (Acts 23 : 1).

with the idea of a world-wide state (Lightfoot on Phil., pp. 270 ff.). "Stoic philosophy had leavened the moral vocabulary of the civilized world" (Vincent, in loco). The life of Paul in Rome had made him think afresh of the great Roman Empire and he himself was a Roman citizen (Acts 22 : 28) by birth and was proud of it. From the great center of the Roman world he would naturally think of Christianity in Roman terms as Jesus so often spoke of the kingdom¹ of God, a Jewish conception. But the Philippians themselves lived in a city that was a Roman colony and so were perfectly familiar with the rights and dignity of Roman citizenship. Clement of Rome also (ad Cor. iii, xxi, liv) shows how Christians owe obligations to a spiritual polity as citizens do to the state. Christians are to live worthily² of the Gospel of Christ. This is the standard. They are "no more strangers and sojourners," but "fellow-citizens"³ with the saints" (Eph. 2 : 19). One of the great lessons for to-day is just this matter of Christian citizenship. The age-long conflict between church and state has caused such a reaction that too many Christians fail to bring their consciences and their votes to bear upon the problem of civil government. The divorce between church and state has been entirely too complete. Churches have no right as organizations to infringe upon the prerogatives of the state. But after all the Christian citizen is still a citizen and must not forget that when he takes a hand, as he must, in civic affairs. A new conscience has come to our citizens who are no longer willing for the laws to be made and to be executed by men who make a specialty of placing their own interests above the public welfare and who ruthlessly sacrifice ethical ideals to carry their point. This new conscience in American business and political life is doing away with many old abuses that flourished because Christians were not worthy citizens. Child labour, white slavery, the liquor traffic, the sweat shop, bribery in elections, the city boss are just a few of the evils that must disappear before the concerted effort of Christian citizens. The party emblem must not be more sacred than the Gospel of Christ. The Christian has at least as much right in city politics as the ward politician or the dive-keeper. The time has come for Christians to clean up the cities of the country and to keep them clean. The day will come when the modern city will be a safe place for women and children to live in. As it is, the city streets are the last place on earth for our boys and girls as Miss Jane Addams has so well shown. It is not good citizenship when money is ground out of the pinched faces of the children and out of the souls and bodies of helpless girls. A citizenship worthy of the Gospel of Christ cannot be indifferent to the social ills in the body politic.

¹ βασιλεία from βασιλεύς.

² ἀξίως. Cf. Inscr. of Pergamum in 2 cent. A. D. Bd. ii, p. 496, for ἀξίως τῆς πόλεως. Deissmann ("Bible Studies," pp. 248 f.) gives five examples of inscriptions from Pergamum with this use of ἀξίως with the genitive. So a priest of Dionysus is praised as συ[ν]τετελεκότος τὰ ἱερὰ ——— ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ.

³ συνπολιταὶ τῶν ἀγίων.

Paul is not sure when he can come, but he is anxious for unity and coöperation on their part in their life together in the Christian Commonwealth in Philippi. But his purpose ¹ is that, whether he comes and sees them or only hears in his absence ² about them, it may be true that they stand together in one spirit.³ It is a great deal to be able to stand when under attack and sometimes it is very hard to do so, especially when others run away. They must stand fast like the famous Macedonian phalanx. Paul made fine use of the military figure of standing one's ground against the hosts of evil in Ephesians 6:13 ff. Team work in the games is absolutely essential. It is so to-day in baseball or football. It was so in the ancient games. Paul knew the spirit of the athletic games and makes frequent use of metaphors from them. He had probably seen the games in the Greek stadium (cf. Phil. 3:14). In 1 Cor. 4:9 he speaks of himself as a "spectacle" ⁴ to the world. In 2 Tim. 2:5 Paul speaks of contending ⁵ in the ¹ ἔνα.

² This sentence is not evenly balanced in the Greek. One would expect ἀκούω to be ἀκούων like ἰδὼν.

³ πνεύματι (spirit) in contrast to ψυχῇ (soul) just below. But the words are sometimes interchanged.

⁴ θέατρον.

⁵ ἀθλήν νομίμως.

games according to the rules. Here he uses the compound verb¹ as in Phil. 4: 3. It is the esprit du corps or camaraderie of college boys in the games or of soldiers in battle. There should be church spirit in every local church that binds all together in Christ "for the faith of the Gospel" (cf. Jude 3 "contend earnestly² for the faith once delivered to the saints").

In particular, those who thus strive in concert for the advance of the faith of the Gospel, the new rule of life, must not be frightened by the adversaries. The word here for frightened³ means to be startled like a scared horse or fluttered like a surprised bird. War horses will stand the booming of cannon and the bursting of shells at their feet. Some Christians are like scared rabbits. They jump and run at the first adversary⁴ who says "Boo!" They have no more courage than grasshoppers and shy at every shadow. They have to be nursed and coddled if they do their ordinary duty as Christians and church members. Panic is the worst sort of defeat. It is rout. This⁵ refusal to be fluttered is proof⁶ to the adversaries of their eternal destruction⁷ and of your eternal salvation.⁸ And this proof comes from God.

¹ συναθλοῦντες. Acting as athletes in concert.

² ἐπαγωνίζεσθαι. Another athletic word from ἀγών contest.

³ πτυρόμενοι. Cf. Diod. Sic. XVII, 34, 6.

⁴ ἀντικείμενος. Lined up against, face to face opposition.

⁵ ἥτις. Explanatory relative.

⁶ ἔνδειξις. Attic law term.

⁷ ἀπωλείας.

⁸ σωτηρίας.

The signal of life or death comes from God, not from the fickle crowd at a gladiatorial show.

5. The Gift of Suffering (verses 29 f.).

The "proof" of God's love, of which Paul spoke in verse 28, is seen¹ precisely in the fact that the Philippians have been honoured by God with the gift of suffering. This sentence is quite broken and Westcott and Hort have tried to mend it by a parenthesis, but the punctuation of the Revised Version is clear enough.² The Philippians not only have the gift³ of faith in Christ, but also of suffering in His behalf. This is one of the great paradoxes of God's love. In Isaiah 48:10 note: "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." The Servant of Jehovah was to be "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" (Isaiah 53:3). The Captain of our salvation was made perfect through sufferings (Heb. 2:10). Jesus suffered as we do and is able to sympathize with us and to help us because of His experiences in the flesh (Heb. 2:17 f.; 4:15 f.). The fellowship with the sufferings of Christ is a favourite idea with Paul (cf. 2 Thess. 1:5; Rom. 8:17; 2 Tim. 2:12). In Colossians 1:24 he even speaks of "filling up in his turn"¹ the sufferings left over by Christ. Paul already had the stake² in the flesh which was given³ to him to keep him humble (2 Cor. 12:7 f.). The Philippians had seen⁴ Paul suffer as a prisoner while with them (Acts 16:23 "many stripes." Cf. 1 Thess. 2:2). Now they hear⁵ of his sufferings in Rome as a prisoner. At last it has come their turn to undergo like⁶ sufferings themselves. It is their time to strive in the arena as Christian gladiators in the same conflict.⁷ He uses the common word (cf. Col. 2:1; 1 Tim. 6:12; Heb. 12:1) for athletic contests (our "agony," "agonize"). The lesson of suffering as a chastisement is one that is learned by experience. Happy is he who learns the Father's hand in the stroke of love (cf. Heb. 12:4-13). Some Christians do not learn it and grow bitter instead of sweet. They are not worthy of the high privilege of suffering for Jesus' sake. The ministry of suffering is one of the blessings of life. It equips us for service in a way that nothing else does or can. Preachers are enriched who themselves drink this cup. Their sympathy is

¹ ὅτι. Because.

² There are here two instances of the broken structure. One is the suspension of the clause after τὸ ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ which is left without an infinitive, and the addition of οὐ μόνον τὸ πιστεῦσιν which necessitates ἀλλὰ καὶ and the repetition of τὸ before πάσχειν. Paul was no stylist when his passion surged over all grammatical bounds (cf. Rom. 4:16), but his meaning is clear. The other instance is the nominative ἔχοντες after ὁμῶν. This is again a common idiom with Paul. See Robertson, "Grammar," etc., pp. 129 f., 439 f.

³ ἐχαρίσθη. Aorist tense, but they still have the gift.

¹ ἀνταναπληρῶ. Note both prepositions ἀνά (up to the brim) and ἀντί, in Paul's term.

² σκόλοψ.

³ ἐδόθη.

⁴ εἶδετε.

⁵ ἀκούετε ἐν ἐμοί.

⁶ τὸν αὐτὸν—οἶον.

⁷ ὁγῶνα. Cf. 1 Thess. 2:2. Paul thus uses the same word about his experiences.

no longer perfunctory. They know by experience what it is to suffer. So the Philippians are now qualified by this new bond of sympathy to understand Paul as they have never done before. "Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake."

V

PAUL'S FULL CUP

(2: 1-11)

“MAKE full my joy” Paul pleads. His cup is not full to the brim. It is not running over with bubbling joy. The Philippians had begun well and were doing well on the whole, but Paul was not satisfied with their attainment. He had a holy dissatisfaction about them as shown in his prayer in 1:9 ff. He longed for them all to see the possibilities of growth in Christ and to be shaken out of a pious complacency. And then there were already signs of strife in the church at Philippi. Rumours of this contention had come to Paul’s ears probably through Epaphroditus. Paul reveals concern in this whole paragraph, in his plea with Euodia and Syntyche (4: 2), in his words about moderation (4: 5) and the peace of God (4: 7). He had just made a fervent exhortation for unity of effort and courage in the face of adversaries (1: 27 f.). Paul refers now to this appeal by the use of “therefore,”¹ skipping the digression in 1: 29 f. He takes up again and presses the exhortation to unity in order to fill up his cup of joy.

¹ ὁγν. Argumentative here, not transitional. Cf. Robertson, “Grammar,” pp. 1191 f.

1. The Grounds of the Appeal (2 : 1).

There are four grounds given here by Paul for his plea for unity. He puts his grounds in the form of conditional clauses, but he assumes in each instance that the condition is true.¹ This "if" is simply a rhetorical device to get a grip on their attention. He places in the form of hypothesis their fundamental experiences of grace in Christ. "The rapid succession and variety of the appeals and the repetition of 'if any' are peculiarly impressive" (Vincent, in loco). The first ground of Paul's appeal is the "stimulus in Christ" (Moffatt). "If there is any power of exhortation in your connection with and experiences in Christ."² The Latin vulgate has consolatio, but exhortation (cf. Rom. 12 : 8; Titus 2 : 15),³ not comfort (2 Cor. 1 : 3; 7 : 4), is the real idea. There is comfort in Christ beyond a doubt, all the real comfort of life, for God is the God of all comfort (2 Cor. 1 : 3) in Christ Jesus (1 : 5). "There is a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother"

¹ The condition here is that of the first class, εἰ with the indicative, though the predicate is not expressed. See Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 1007-1012. Cf. Virgil, Aen. i. 603 for similar rhetorical form (si qua, si quid).

² εἴ τις παράκλησις ἐν Χριστῷ.

³ παράκλησις (from παρα—καλέω, to call to one's side) means "exhortation" first, then "comfort." Cf. double meaning of παράκλητος (Paraclete).

(Prov. 18:24). "The Lord will even light my candle" (Ps. 18:28). But that is not the idea of Paul here. Jesus is both Advocate and Comforter, but here He is presented by Paul as the Advocate who pleads the cause of God to the Philippians. The whole case of Christ, His Person and His Work and in particular the experience of the Philippians is here offered for consideration. "If your life in Christ, your knowledge of Christ, speaks to your hearts with a persuasive eloquence" (Lightfoot). Paul's mystic phrase "in Christ" which he uses so often here has all the rich content that he can pour into it. Let Christ speak to you in the hush of your own hearts. I have seen a physician try to find a response to all sorts of stimuli in a victim of apoplexy. He used needles, he touched the ball of the foot, he used every known physiological device to find signs of life. If Christ makes no appeal to the professed Christian, he is not "in Christ." He is out of contact with Christ. He is spiritually dead. If one's own life in Christ does not stimulate the soul to the noblest effort, it is useless to go on with the appeal. Response to stimuli is the sign of life. The absence of it is the proof of death.

The second ground of Paul's appeal is the "incentive of love." Here again the word means encouragement, not consolation, though the Vulgate has solatium caritatis. Paul uses the two words side by side also in 1 Thessalonians 2:11. The idea is the tender persuasiveness of love. If love has any power by its tenderness to stir your hearts, then listen to me. It is the incentive that springs from love. He does not define whose "love" he has in mind and probably leaves it vague on purpose. He may be thinking of his own love for the Philippians, but he may also be presenting to their contemplation Christ's love for them. "Love makes the world go round." Love spurs to one last endeavour. Dr. John A. Broadus used to close his last lecture to the class in Homiletics in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary with a plea for the young ministers to do their very best for Jesus' sake. And then, with tears in his eyes and in the eyes of his pupils, he begged that they would do just a bit better for their old teacher's sake. A man who is deaf to love is deaf indeed, deaf to the love of mother, of father, of wife, of child, of Jesus, of God the Father. Love of man may let us go, but not the love of God. We can all understand George Matheson's "Oh, love that will not let me go," the deathless love of Jesus.

The third ground of appeal is the participation in the Holy Spirit. "If fellowship in the Spirit is a reality," Paul means. It is a phrase that meant a great deal for Paul (cf. 2 Cor. 13:13; Rom. 15:30). People use it glibly and without meaning. The Holy Spirit is very vague to many Christians who refer to the Third Person in the Godhead by "it." The Greek used grammatical gender which has no bearing in English.¹ The word here for "fellowship"² we have had already (1:5) and means participation or partnership. If we have any partnership in the life and blessings of the Holy Spirit, then we are ready to listen to Paul's plea for unity. The Holy Spirit is the unifying principle in the local church (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4-11). He alone can bring order out of chaos and preserve harmony in the body of Christ. Unless the Holy Spirit rules, there is mere excitement and confusion (1 Cor. 14). Instance to-day the "Holy Rollers" and other fanatics. Without the Holy Spirit there is no life and no power.

The fourth ground of appeal is compassion in the heart. Paul uses two words here. One is the seat or organ of the compassion ("tender mercies"³), the other is the pity itself ("compassion"⁴). My physician, the late Dr. J. B. Marvin, a brilliant scientist and earnest Christian, used often to speak of the

¹ πνεῦμα is grammatically neuter. But in John 14:26 ἐκεῖνος skips over πνεῦμα ὃ to παράκλητος. The Holy Spirit is a person and we should say "He."

² κοινωνία.

³ σπλάγχνα. The organ of the higher viscera (the heart, the stomach, etc.).

⁴ οἰκτιρμοί. In Col. 3:12 Paul combines them σπλάγχνα οἰκτιρμού as the Vulgate does here viscera miserationis. There is a difficulty in the Greek text (εἴ τις σπλάγχνα) that has various explanations. Paul may have written εἴ τι in all four clauses, the τι being in the predicate in each instance. τις here may be a scribal error due to the σ in the next word. There is an early error undoubtedly.

"stomach-brain" in justification of this ancient idiom, a sort of sensitive plate in the stomach that corresponded to the brain. If you have a heart and if your heart has any compassion, listen to me, says Paul. If you love me at all, hear me. Could they resist that plea?

2. The Nature of the Plea (2 : 2).

Paul's cup of joy will indeed be full if the Philippians respond to his fourfold appeal. There is, forsooth, real joy in having our own way, but that is not Paul's feeling. His word here for "make full" is the original meaning of the word¹ so often translated "fulfill." John the Baptist uses the word about his joy in the joy of Jesus the Bridegroom: "This my joy therefore is made full" (John 3 : 29).² The substance or purport³ of Paul's plea is that the Philippians exhibit the unity of the spirit of which he spoke in 1 : 27 f. Paul cannot rest content while the spirit of faction exists in this generous, glorious church at Philippi. He uses "the tautology of earnestness" (Vaughan), but it is not quite "hypercritical" to see some distinction in the expressions employed to emphasize unity.

There is first the unity of thought ("think the same thing "¹), even identity of thought ("of one mind," "thinking the one thing" ²). Surely this is not an easy thing to do, especially where people have active minds and independent spirits. It is only true where minds are in tune that two minds think as one. Then one will say: "I was just thinking," and both say the same thing at once. There is something in telepathy when mind answers to mind like wireless telegraphy with transmitter and receiver. To be sure, one can be acquiescent without thinking and parrot-like repeat what he hears. This is a mechanical echo and not real harmony of thought from conviction and sympathy. There should be also unison of affection, "having the same love." ³ We have the phrase "two hearts that beat as one." If this were true, preachers would remain longer in their pastorates, churches would be more fruitful in good works, there would be fewer losses in the membership.

¹ πληρώσατε.

² αὐτῇ οὖν ἡ χαρὰ ἡ ἐμὴ πεπλήρωται.

³ ἵνα here is not final, but sub-final. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 991-994.

There should be also harmony of feeling, "of one accord." ⁴ A common disposition will ensue where there is unity of thought and of affection. Our word

¹ τὸ αὐτὸ φρονῆτε. Deissmann ("Bible Studies," p. 256) quotes an inscription of Rhodes of 2 cent. B. C. which has ταῦτὰ λέγοντες ταῦτὰ φρονοῦντες ἤλθομεν used of a married couple.

² τὸ ἐν φρονοῦντες. Sometimes both constructions occur together. Cf. Aristides de Conc. Rhod., p. 569 ἐν καὶ ταῦτὸν φρονοῦντες, Polybius V. 104, λέγοντες ἐν καὶ ταῦτό.

³ τὴν αὐτὴν ἀγάπην ἔχοντες.

⁴ σύνψυχοι. Soul with soul.

accord (heart to heart, ad+cor) suggests two hearts in perfect key, a symphony of the spirit. Certainly there would be fewer divorces if husband and wife never got out of tune. There is a music of the spheres. The same note will respond when in key with another instrument. If one note is struck, the one in key answers to it. Everything has its note. The whole church is a choir and must be kept in tune. Musical natures are sensitive and high strung and readily get out of tune. But, if each one of us keeps his life in tune with God, "in tune with the Infinite," it will not be impossible to get in tune with each other.¹ The discord will all be lost in the glorious orchestra that blends in common praise to God. Such a church will have variety in plenty, but it will be the variety of concord, not jarring notes out of tune with the rest.

3. The Preëminent Social Grace (2: 3 f.).

What is it? Elegance of manners? The gift of saying agreeable things? Courtesy? These are all worth while and courtesy comes very close to Paul's idea of humility, if it is courtesy of the heart and not of the mere occasion or fashion. "Paul's ethic is at least as much a social as an individual ethic."² Church life is a social fact and humility is a prime factor in it. Egotism and party spirit destroy the unity essential to healthy church life. The antidote to these evils is humility. It is absolutely essential to social harmony. The egotist is a bore in any circle. The partisan is tiresome to all save his circle. Egotism and partisan pride seem to be the chief perils to the Philippian church.¹ The Jewish element had the pride of privilege, the Gentile element the pride of culture. The Pharisee was an egotist and a partisan by inheritance of seclusive virtue and grace. The cultured Greek or the oriental Gnostic had a profound sense of his own superiority over the outside barbarians. So Paul attacks earnestly the sins that lie in the way of spiritual unity in Philippi. Humility is essential to concord in the church.

¹ σὺν —

² Holtzmann, "N. T. Theol.," ii., p. 162.

There is no participle in the first clause in verse 3, but we need only repeat the last one in verse 2, "thinking² nothing by way of³ faction or vainglory." The word for "faction"⁴ Paul has used already (1:17) of a party in Rome that loved to trouble him. He is reluctant to see that spirit break out in Philippi. Perhaps already the church members are beginning to take sides in the dispute between Euodia and Syntyche. There is danger of a conflagration if the fire is not stamped out at once. Vainglory⁵ is emptiness

¹ Vincent, in loco.

² φρονοῦντες.

³ κατὰ. The standard of measure. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 608 f.

⁴ ἐριθία.

⁵ κενυδοξία. See Gal. 5:26 for κενόδοξοι where envy is also mentioned. Ignatius (Magn. XI.) has ἄγκιστρα τῆς κενυδοξίας. The Vulgate has inanem gloriam.

of ideas. The man who is puffed up with conceit is regarded as empty headed. Censoriousness and conceit are the marks of the zealous braggart whose loud protestations do not conceal his poverty of ideas. Vanity (from vanus) means emptiness. Moody has a good word here: "Strife is knocking another down—vainglory is setting oneself up."

The antidote is humility. "But in lowliness of mind,"¹ Paul says. This word is very common in the New Testament, but does not appear earlier, though it may turn up in the papyri of an earlier date any time. Plutarch has an adjective² kin to it. Epictetus³ uses the very word, but in the ancient sense of meanness of spirit: "Where is there still room for flattery, for meanness?" The ancients meant abjectness of spirit or a grovelling condition or rank self-abasement by the adjective. Plato and the Platonists do sometimes use it for submission to the divine order or modesty of attitude, a preparation for the use of the word by Christ. Jesus raised humility to the rank of a grace and spoke of Himself as "lowly" (Matt. 11:29) and often praised the humble and condemned the proud and self-seeking.

¹ τῇ ταπεινοφροσύνῃ. For the case cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 530.

² ταπεινόςφρων. Cf. Deissmann, "Light From the Ancient East," p. 72, n. 3.

³ Bk. III, ch. xxiv, § 56 ποῦ ἔτι κολακείας τύπος, ποῦ ταπεινοφροσύνης; see frequent use of ταπεινός by Epictetus quoted by Sharp, "Epictetus and the New Testament," pp. 130 f.

He made "low" mean "lowly" and gave dignity to this despised word. Once Paul (Col. 2: 18) uses the word for "mock humility," an echo of the ancient usage. The word has played a large part in Christian ethics.¹ Absolute humility we learn at the feet of Jesus before God. Relative humility we practice towards each other. It is the crowning social grace and is Christian in origin and spirit.

"Each counting other better than himself."² This is a very astonishing clause, to be sure, from the standpoint of the natural man. Paul has the same idea in Romans 12: 10 "in honour preferring one another."³ It is the deliberate estimate and preference of others, not a momentary impulse of politeness. I have heard Paul's principle here pointedly challenged by a Christian minister as making too great a demand on one's self-esteem. But there is no doubt at all as to the meaning of Paul and that he is in harmony with the teaching of Jesus on the subject. It is difficult to practise this Christian chivalry to women, to aged men, to ministers for Christ's sake, to all men for humanity's sake. Deference is a beautiful word and the absence of it in the family is "pig manners," every one for himself. A girl at school surprised her friends by a motto on the wall of her room which read: "I am willing to be third."

¹ Cf. Neander, "Planting of Christianity," I, p. 483.

² ἀλλήλους ἡγοούμενοι ὑπερέχοντας ἑαυτῶν.

³ τῇ τιμῇ ἀλλήλους προηγούμενοι.

God was first with her, others second, self third. That is the spirit of Christ. This is the secret of the life of William Booth. Once, when he was unable to come to a meeting in New York, he sent the cablegram "Others." That is the key to the life of David Livingstone dying in the heart of Africa.

Proper self-respect does not demand selfishness. "Not looking each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others."¹ Paul does not mean that a man should not attend to his own business. If one does not do his own work, no one else will do it for him. Paul is not advocating our being busy-bodies in other people's affairs. His use of "also"² shows that he has no such idea. But he means that one must not fix his eye³ (like the runner on the goal) upon his own interests to the exclusion of those of others. The Christian has no right to conduct his life by the law of the jungle. He cannot look out simply for "number one." The Golden Rule must be applied to business and to politics as well as to private life. There is no love in the rule of might, in ruthless overriding of the rights of others. Might does not make right in the state or in the individual. That is the rule of the bully and the braggart. The Juggernaut method is the spirit of the devil, and rides rough shod over all in the way whether men, women, or children. There is no surer way to wreck a church than this spirit of selfishness, the rule or ruin policy. Social justice is impossible without courtesy, love, sympathy. This is what Paul pleads for and to enforce it he gives the supreme example of the ages.

¹ The plural ἑκαστοι is unusual in the New Testament, though common elsewhere. The participle σκοποῦντες is the correct text, not σκοπεῖτε, but it is tantamount to an imperative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 1132-1135. The word here for "others" is ἑτέρων, not ἄλλων, even people of another class. The caste spirit is all over the world. "People like that," we hear in a sniff of contempt.

² ἀλλὰ καὶ.

³ σκοποῦντες. From σκοπός goal, aim.

4. The Example of Jesus (2:5-11).

(a) For Our Imitation (verse 5). Look at Jesus: "Have this mind in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Kennedy (in loco) makes a striking suggestion as to what this sentence means. It is very awkward in the Greek.¹ He takes it to mean: "Think this very same thing in yourselves that you think in Christ Jesus." That is, apply the same rule to yourselves that you see and approve in Jesus our Lord and Saviour. It is not always true that Christians put religion into their business relations or feel the same call for consecration that they love to note in Christ. "The keenest zeal may be displayed in religious work, accompanied by singular laxity of principle in the common concerns of daily business and social intercourse" (Kennedy). This is certainly a possible meaning. Some people are piously humble on Sunday, but a terror on Monday. Sheldon's "In His Steps" did not quite state the case. We are to do what Jesus wishes us to do, not always just what He did. Paul cites the example of Jesus (cf. verse 8, "humbled himself") with the command that the Philippians imitate it.

¹ Kennedy would supply φρονεῖτε after ὁ instead of ἐφρονεῖτο or ᾗ. The use of ὁμῖν as a reflexive is common enough. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 680 f., 687 f.

(b) The Preincarnate Glory (verse 6). Every word in this verse has been the subject of fierce controversy. Kennedy makes two very sensible observations. One is that Paul is not here giving a technical theological discussion. The other is that he is not using the language of philosophical metaphysics. He is probably familiar with the chief terms of Greek philosophy and of rabbinical theology. The Gnostics in a way combined both sets of terms. But here Paul is making a practical use of the Incarnation of Christ to enforce the great lesson of humility as essential to unity. Christ was humble. Therefore we should be. It is a piece of popular theology that Paul gives us in this great passage (2:6-11), but the words are balanced with rhetorical rhythm (two strophes of four lines each). He is not formally discussing Christology, but he does lift the veil and shows us Jesus Christ in His Preincarnate Glory as John's Gospel does in 1:1-10. As there, so here Paul shows identity of personality in the two states of Christ.¹ There is no "Jesus or Christ" controversy for Paul.¹ Christ, according to Paul here, is divine in nature and glory before the Incarnation. Bacon,² forsooth, thinks that John's Gospel merely copies Paul's Christology here. The preëxistence of Christ does not carry with it the preëxistence of others. (See Wordsworth's "Ode on Immortality.") It is poetical to say "trailing clouds of glory do we come," but not necessarily true.

¹ By the use of $\theta\varsigma$ for both spheres of existence.

The definite statement is here made by Paul that Christ "existed"³ before His Incarnation (cf. also 2 Cor. 8:9⁴). This Preincarnate state of Christ was "in the form of God,"⁵ a difficult phrase to translate. God, of course, has no "form" in the usual sense of that term. It is used of Christ's human form in Mark 16:12 and of Christ's Incarnation in "the form of a servant" here in verse 9. Lightfoot argues that the word means here "the essential attributes of God" as below in verse 9 "the essential attributes of servant." Paul has no notion of a body or form

¹ Cf. Hibbert Journal Supplement (January, 1909).

² "The Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate," 1910, p. 7.

³ ὑπάρχων. This word denotes prior existence. Cf. ἐν ἀρχῇ in John 1:1 and πρωτότοκος in Col. 1:15, 17. But ὑπάρχων comes in the κοινή to be a mere copula = being. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 394.

⁴ Here we have ὧν.

⁵ ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ. Vulgate in forma Dei. The word does differ from οὐσία, φύσις, εἶδος, εἰκὼν, and σχῆμα, but one must not go into psychological or philosophical refinements in these words. Sharp ("Epictetus and the New Testament," pp. 32 f.) shows that Epictetus used ἐκ ψυχῆς μορφῆς = ἡ ἐκτὸς περιγραφῆς (Bk. IV, ch. v, §§ 19, 20).

for God, but simply the character of God in His real essence. In Colossians 1:15 Paul describes Jesus as the Image¹ of God, as the author of Hebrews (1:3) calls Him "the Radiation² of His Glory and the Character³ or Stamp of His Substance⁴ or Nature." We cannot comprehend the nature of God's Person. John applied Logos⁵ to Christ as the Expression of God. Paul means to affirm that Christ had not the accidents of the divine glory and environment, but the essential attributes of God's nature, actual deity, not mere divinity such as is dimly seen in all men who were made in God's image.

This "equality with God"⁶ refers only to relation, which "in the form of God" refers only to nature. Jesus could not give up His essential character of Sonship. He was the Son of God in the Preincarnate state. He was the Son of God during the Incarnation after He became also the Son of man. So John says that the Logos became flesh (John 1:14). Jesus did not consider⁷ this state of "equality with God," His glory at the right hand of the Father, a thing to be held on to⁸ at any cost when, by giving up the glory and holding on to the nature of God, He could enter upon His redemptive work for mankind. This is my view of this crux interpretum. The notion of "robbery" is not the idea of Paul in spite of the Vulgate "rapina" which itself is ambiguous and may mean only a highly-prized possession. Kennedy argues cleverly for the interpretation that Jesus was not willing to compel men by a display of His Godhood to recognize His deity, but preferred that men acknowledge Him by gradual conviction. This is a possible interpretation, but nothing like so probable as the one just given.

¹ εἰκών.² ἀπαύγασμα.³ Χαρακτήρ.⁴ ὑπόστασις. These are all philosophical terms.⁵ ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ (John 1:1).⁶ τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ. It is doubtful if much can be made of the distinction between ἴσα and ἴσον (cf. John 5:18 ἴσον τῷ θεῷ). Lightfoot makes ἴσον refer to the person, ἴσα to the attributes.⁷ οὐχ ἡγήσατο.⁸ ἀπαγμός. Words in μος express the action of the verb as a rule, but they often come to mean the result of the action

(c) The Humiliation (verses 7 f.). These two verses give a wonderful portrayal of what was in-like those in μα. Cf. in the New Testament ἱλασμός=propitiation, not the act of propitiating; ἁγιασμός, not the act of consecration, but sanctification. Other words so used are θερισμός, ἱματισμός, ψαλμός, ὑπογράμμις.

¹One thinks at once of Bruce's great book on "The Humiliation of Our Lord" (1902). Many other books are worth consulting like Bruce, "St. Paul's Conception of Christianity" (1898); Denney's "Jesus and His Gospel" (1908); Dorner, "History of the Development of the Person of Christ" (5 vols., 1878); Fairbairn, "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology" (1893); Forsyth, "The Person and Place of Jesus Christ" (1909); Gifford, "The Incarnation" (1897); Gore, "The Incarnation of the Son of God" (1891); Liddon, "Our Lord's Divinity" (1889); Mackintosh, "The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ" (1912); Sanday, "Christologies Ancient and Modern" (1910); Schweitzer, "The Quest of the Historical Jesus" (1910); Somerville, "St. Paul's Conception of Christ" (1897); Stalker, "The Christology of Jesus" (1901); Warfield, "The Lord of Glory" (1907).

volved in Christ's Incarnation. Bacon¹ says that the key-note of the synoptic story of Jesus "is not incarnation, but apotheosis," while in Paul's Epistles and John's Gospel it is incarnation. There is undoubtedly in the Synoptic Gospels the account of the slow recognition of Jesus as the Son of God, but that appears in the Fourth Gospel also. Besides, the Synoptic Gospels present Jesus at first as the Son of God (Luke 1:32-35; Matt. 1:18, 23; Luke 2:11; Mark 1:11; Matt. 3:17; Luke 3:22). The Baptism of Jesus by John and the recognition of Jesus as the Son of God by the Father occurs in each of the Synoptics, and belongs therefore to Q or the Logia of criticism, the oldest form of the tradition. From the first Jesus is presented as both the Son of God and the Son of man. He was the Son of God before He was the Son of man. He continued to be the Son of God after He became the Son of man.

He did give up much in order to become the Son of man. That was inevitable and foreseen by Christ. Paul has said in verse 6 that Christ did not cling to "the equality with God" when He faced the redemptive work for man, but "he emptied himself"² of the visible glories and the manifest prerogatives of deity. We may pass by the various Kenosis theories which seek to explain of what Christ emptied Himself and confine ourselves to the details of the humiliation mentioned in these two verses. We can feel certain that He did not empty Himself of His divine nature ("the form of God" of verse 6), which He could not do in the nature of the case (no son can change the fact of his sonship), but only "of the insignia of His majesty" (Lightfoot), the outward manifestation of His deity. Jesus did not appear to men in the likeness of God, but of man. He suffered in so doing in ways that are beyond our comprehension. "We may do well to cherish the impression that this self-emptying on the part of the eternal Son of God, for our salvation, involves realities which we cannot conceive or put into words. There was more in this emptying of Himself than we can think or say" (Rainy, Philippians, p. 119). We catch glimpses of the yearning of Christ for the glory which He had with the Father before the Incarnation and even before the world was by the Father's side¹ (John 17: 5). There is a fullness of knowledge² between the Son and the Father not true of others and Jesus often goes alone³ to pray with the Father. How the Son missed the glories of heaven we can only imagine. How the sin and desolation of earth jarred upon His sensitive soul we do have some comprehension, but only a little after all, for we have become used to the dullness and the hardness of our world. Perhaps, it was in mercy to Jesus that there was some humiliation in His Incarnation, else He could not have endured His earthly estate. We are expressly told here that the emptying was voluntary on Christ's part. The emphasis is on the act (the verb). It applied to the state of glory, to some extent to His knowledge, and to His power. Into that subject I do not here enter. I do not believe that Jesus subjected Himself to error of any kind. He mentions His lack of knowledge about the time of His second coming (Matt. 24: 36). He shows surprise and weariness. He was a real man, free from sin and from errors of ignorance, I believe. No effort to explain the combination of deity and humanity has succeeded. We do not understand the nature of God. We do not understand our own human nature (spirit and matter in combination). It is not surprising that we fail in the union of the divine and the human. Certainly Dr. William Sanday's excursion¹ with the "subliminal consciousness" does not explain it. But let us turn from merely speculative theology to Paul's interpretation of the details involved in the Incarnation.

¹ "The Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate," p. 11.

² ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν. Vulgate semetipsum exinanivit.

¹ παρὰ σοί.

² ἐπιγινώσκει (Matt. 11: 27).

³ αὐτὸς μόνος (John 6: 15).

"Taking the form of a servant,"² Paul says, by way of explanation of "emptied himself." Here Paul employs the same term for "form" that he did in verse 6. As Christ possessed the real attributes of deity, so He took upon Himself the real attributes of servanthip. Here there is a change in the condition of Christ. He was ¹ in the form of God, but He took ² upon Himself the form of a servant. However, we must not understand that Christ lost "the form of God" in so doing. He lost only the appearance as God, not His essential nature as God. It is the reality of Christ's humanity that is here affirmed by the side of the reality of His deity. He did not become an actual "slave" ³ of any single man, but was an actual "servant" (or slave) of mankind. Paul thus "describes the humility to which He condescended" (Kennedy, in loco). The Master ⁴ of all became the slave of all (Matt. 20: 27 f.; Mark 10: 44 f.). Jesus entered upon the condition of service as He had before the condition of equality with God (Vincent, in loco).

¹ "Christologies Ancient and Modern," 1910.

² μορφῇ δοῦλου λαβών. Cf. μορφῇ θεοῦ in verse 6. The aorist participle is here simultaneous with the verb ἐκένωσεν and explanatory (Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 860 f., 1127).

"Becoming in the likeness of men," ⁵ a further explanation of the self-emptying of Christ. Here again Paul states that Jesus entered ⁶ upon the state of His humanity as we have it in John 1: 14. But the word here is "likeness," ⁷ not "form" as in verse 6. It is a real likeness, but not identity that is meant. All of Jesus is not human. Hence Paul could not use the

¹ ὑπάρχων.

² λαβών.

³ δοῦλος.

⁴ Κύριος. Cf. John 15: 20 οὐκ ἔστιν δοῦλος μείζων τοῦ κυρίου αὐτοῦ.

⁵ ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος.

⁶ γενόμενος, not ὑπάρχων. So θεὸς ἦν and σὰρξ ἐγένετο in John 1: 1, 14.

⁷ ὁμοιώματι.

word for "form."¹ Christ "was no mere phantom, no mere incomplete copy of humanity" (Kennedy, in loco). "To affirm likeness is at once to assert similarity and to deny sameness" (Dickson, Baird Lectures, 1883). The humanity of Jesus, though thoroughly real and not merely apparent as the Docetic Gnostics held, yet did not express the whole of Christ's self. He was still "in the form of God" in His essential nature in spite of His Incarnation. He still has the essential nature of God while in the similitude² of man. The plural³ here shows Christ's relation to the race. Christ no longer wore His "Godlike majesty and visible glories" (Ellicott), but appeared as a man and to most only as a man.

"And being found in fashion as a man."⁴ Here the word for "fashion"⁵ refers more to the outward appearance of Christ. It is like the word "habit"⁶ as applied to dress. The "form of a bondservant" expressed the essential nature of the servanthship of Christ and the "likeness of men" showed the reality of His humanity (Vincent, in loco). This word

¹ μορφή.

² In similitudinem hominum factus (Vulgate).

³ ἀνθρώπων.

⁴ καὶ σχήματι ἐδρεθείς ὡς ἄνθρωπος.

⁵ σχήματι.

⁶ Vulgate has in habitus inventus ut homo. Habitus is from habeo as σχῆμα from ἔχω. The word σχῆμα is used of God in Test. XII Patr. Zab. 9 ὁψεσθε θεὸν ἐν σχήματι ἀνθρώπου. In Benj. 10 note ἐπὶ γῆς φανέντα ἐν μορφῇ ἀνθρώπου.

"fashion" expresses the appeal that Christ made to the senses, to human observation. "His outward guise was altogether human" (Kennedy, in loco). The words for "form" and "fashion" are contrasted by Paul in Romans 12:2: "And be not fashioned¹ according to this world," the outward expression in conduct and manners, "but be ye transformed² by the renewing of your mind," the inward spiritual change. Jesus was discovered³ or recognized as⁴ a man, though He was more than man, and in His very humanity revealed God to men if they had eyes to see (cf. John 14:7-9; Matt. 11:27).

"He humbled himself."⁵ This is not a mere repetition of "emptied himself" in verse 7. This verb expresses plainly and simply the fact of the Humiliation⁶ of Christ. "The depth of the self-renunciation" (Kennedy) is brought out by the following phrases. The great act was voluntary on Christ's part and hence has moral value. This idea is set forth clearly in Hebrews 9:12 "having found by himself eternal redemption"⁷ (the middle voice)

¹ συσχηματίζεσθε.

² μεταμορφώσθε. Cf. also Phil. 3:10 συμμορφιζόμενος and 1 Pet. 1:14 συσχηματιζόμενοι. In Phil. 3:21 we have μετασχηματίσει and σύμμορφον.

³ εὑρεθείς.

⁴ ὥς. Implying that he was more than man.

⁵ ἐταπείνωσεν ἑαυτὸν. The emphasis is here on the verb as in verse 7 on ἑαυτὸν.

⁶ The Vulgate has humiliavit semetipsum.

⁷ αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν ἐδράμενος.

and in 9:14 "he offered himself,"¹ a construction like the one in Philippians 2:8.

"Becoming obedient unto death."² Jesus followed the Father's will obediently in the path that led straight to death. The hate and guilt of His enemies do not at all remove the dignity and the glory of Christ's death for sinners. Paul speaks of the obedience³ of Christ also in Romans 5:19. It was an obedience that Jesus had to learn from suffering as is true of all sons (Heb. 5:8) and won Jesus the right and the power to offer eternal life to all those who obey Him (Heb. 5:9). There were moments when Jesus was tempted to turn back from the road that led to death, moments of anguish that rent His very soul with a cry to the Father (John 12:27 f.; Matt. 26:39; Mark 14:35 f.; Luke 22:42), times that brought sweat like blood from His forehead (Luke 22:44) and tears to His eyes (Heb. 5:7). Jesus saw the end from the beginning, saw His "hour" coming, saw the gathering cloud about to break upon His head, but resolutely set His face to go on to Jerusalem to meet it. The very reality of His humanity made Him flinch as He saw that He was to be regarded as sin by the Father while He bore the sin of the world in His death, and made

¹ ἑαυτὸν προσήνεγκεν with the emphasis on ἑαυτὸν.

² γενόμενος ὑπήκουος μέχρι θανάτου. The Vulgate has factus obediens usque ad mortem.

³ ὑπακοῆς. Note force of ὑπό (sub) under.

Him cry aloud when the Father's presence left Him in the dread darkness and loneliness (Matt. 27:46). But Jesus held on His way "unto death"¹ and was able to look on His death as a "glorification" (John 13:31 f.; 17:2). He went as far as death in His humiliation. "Yea, the death of the cross,"² Paul adds, as the lowest rung in this Jacob's Ladder of Christ's humanity of which Jesus had spoken to Nathanael (John 1:51). Christ left His place in glory and majesty by the Father's side with all the Father's wealth of grandeur and became a poor man on earth (2 Cor. 8:9). He took the estate of a servant and bore the likeness of men and no longer seemed to be God to the multitudes. He Himself was like a bondservant and served others on earth. He humbled Himself to the end and met death as a condemned criminal with all the shame of the Cross. Down, down Christ went to the bottom of darkness, the very depth of humiliation and shame. The body of one that hung on a tree was accursed according to the Mosaic law (Deut. 21:23) and Paul knew this well (Gal. 3:13). Cicero spoke of crucifixion as the most cruel of punishments (Verr. V. 64). The Roman boasted of his right to die a freeman, free from the very name of cross.¹ Paul, as a Roman citizen, was free from this shame. He was beheaded, though the tradition is that Peter was crucified head downward. The Jews stumbled² at the cross of Christ and the Greeks thought it foolishness,³ but Paul came to see in it the wisdom and the power of God (1 Cor. 1:23 f.). Jesus saw the shame of the Cross and felt it keenly, but He endured it for the sake of the joy that would be His when He reached the goal and finished His atoning death (Heb. 12:2). Therefore Jesus despised the shame.⁴ The Cross of Christ has come to be His Crown of Glory.

¹ μέχρι θανάτου. Cf. μέχρις αἵματος (Heb. 12:4) of those who had not yet resisted unto blood and μέχρι δεσμών (2 Tim. 2:9) "unto bonds."

² θανάτου δὲ σταυροῦ. Note this use of δέ as addition. Cf. Rom. 3:22; 9:30. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 1183-1185.

(d) The Exaltation (verses 9-11). Paul has taken us down to the bottom of the Valley of Death into which Jesus went, the valley of darkness and shame. He has not forgotten his purpose in appealing to the example of Christ. It is to enforce the lesson of humility, "lowliness of mind" (2:3), the mind of Christ Jesus (2:5). Jesus Himself is the supreme illustration of His own saying: "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted"⁵ (Luke 14:11; 18:14). Paul seems to know this Logion of Jesus for he says: "Wherefore also God highly exalted

¹ Cf. Cicero pro Rabir., V. 10 Nomen ipsum crucis absit non modo a corpore civium Romanorum sed etiam a cogitatione, oculis, auribus.

² σκάνδαλον.

³ μωρία.

⁴ ὑπέμεινεν σταυρὸν αἰσχύνῃς καταφρονήσας.

⁵ ὁ ταπεινῶν ἑαυτὸν ὑψωθήσεται.

him.”¹ The “wherefore” is not reason, but consequence (cf. Heb. 2:9; 12:2). The exaltation is the result of the humiliation. “The idea of Christ’s receiving His exaltation as a reward was repugnant to the Reformed theologians” (Vincent, in loco), but there is no objection certainly to regarding it as the natural result of His service. “Christ’s saying in Matthew 23:12 was gloriously fulfilled in His own case” (Meyer, in loco). It is not clear whether Paul means to say that Jesus had a higher state of glory than before His Incarnation or not. That is the natural way to take the verb² here. He had not lost “the form of God,” but He had “emptied himself” of the majesty and dignity in His Pre-incarnate state. This He received again and sat in transcendent glory at the right hand of God on high (cf. Rom. 1:3f.; 8:34; Col. 3:1; 1 Cor. 14:25). Paul does not here say in what the “superior” dignity consists which Christ did not have before His Incarnation. I agree with Ellicott that it is His Humanity which was permanently added to His Divinity. He is the Son of man now as well as the Son of God which He was before. The argument in Hebrews 2:5-18 illustrates the point which comes out also in Paul’s own argument here.

“And gave unto him the name which is above

¹ διὸ καὶ ὁ θεὸς αὐτὸν ὑπερύψωσεν. Vulgate exaltavit.

² ὑπερύψωσεν. Cf. Psalm 97 (96):9 σφόδρα ὑπερυψώθης ὑπὲρ πάντας θεούς.

every name."¹ The obvious implication of this language is that the gracious bestowal of this name upon Christ as the prerogative of the Father was because of the Incarnation. The Son had voluntarily given up His position of "equality with the Father" and taken a subordinate one on earth (cf. John 14:28, "for the Father is greater than I"). "Christ obtained as a gift what He renounced as a prize" (Vincent, in loco). But what is "the name which is above every name"? There is great diversity of opinion. Lightfoot and Haupt make it simply "title" or "dignity" as "name"² often represents "power," "authority." Vincent takes it to be "Jesus Christ," "combining the human name, which points to the conquest won in the flesh, and the Messianic name, 'The Anointed of God.' The two factors of the name are successively taken up in verses 10, 11." Ellicott makes it Jesus, "the name of His humiliation, and henceforth that of His exaltation and glory." Kennedy (in loco) considers it "amazing" how one can hold this view, but the very next verse ("in the name of Jesus") certainly lends colour to this interpretation. Besides, it strengthens greatly the point of Paul's use of the example of Jesus if the added glory after Christ's Ascension is precisely the human nature of Jesus which was His state of humiliation. This point appeals to me, I confess, in spite of the fact that the name "Jesus" was already (Matt. 1:21) given to Christ before His Ascension. Still, there is force in the argument for "Lord"¹ as the word meant by Paul in lieu of the Tetragrammaton (the unpronounceable name of Jehovah). The Jews often used "the Name" when referring to this word.² Jeremy Taylor so interpreted it: "He hath changed the ineffable name into a name utterable by man, and desirable by all the world; the majesty is arrayed in robes of mercy, the tetragrammaton or adorable mystery of the patriarchs is made fit for pronunciation and expression when it becometh the name of the Lord's Christ." The confession of Jesus as "Lord" in verse 11 gives colour to this view. But even so, we must not forget that it is Jesus who still preserves His human nature who is termed Lord. He is our Elder Brother at the right hand of God.

¹ καὶ ἐχαρίσατο αὐτῷ τὸ ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πάντων ὀνομα.

² ὄνομα. So in the papyri as in the Septuagint.

"That in the name of Jesus every knee should bow."³ It is not "at" the name of Jesus, not mere genuflection. There is no essential merit in that attitude every time the name of Jesus is pronounced or heard. It is reverent worship that is here presented. Jesus is the object of worship. Surely it is worth while to note that Paul makes a point to use the name for Christ's human life, the name Jesus. Many had this name, the Greek form of Joshua,¹ but they were not saviours from sin (Matt. 1:21). Jesus was worshipped while in the flesh and He is still the Son of man. The Epistle to the Hebrews uses constantly the name Jesus and defends gloriously the dignity of Christ's humanity. Jesus purchased the right to this universal adoration with the price of His blood. It is interesting to compare Revelation 5, where Jesus is pictured as receiving worship in heaven from all created things, with this verse. This idea of the mystic sympathy of the whole universe with the Cosmic Christ occurs also in Romans 8:21 f.; 1 Cor. 15:24; Ephesians 5:20-22; Hebrews 2:8. Paul's language in Philippians 2:10f. seems to reflect the Gnostic terminology so freely condemned in Colossians and Ephesians. "And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord."² The Lordship of Jesus came to be the test of loyalty. The password in the dark days of persecution came to be "Jesus as Lord." This was the Shibboleth of the faithful. It is so yet. Vain is the praise of those who refuse to bow the knee to Jesus and to confess Him as Lord. One is reminded of Charles Lamb saying that, if Shakespeare appeared in the company of literati, they would all rise, but, if Jesus came, they would all kneel. This word for "Lord" does not in itself imply divinity. It was used for Master as opposed to slave (Eph. 6:9), and even for "sir" in address (Matt. 13:27). But in the Septuagint it was a common translation for the Hebrew words for God. It was used also for Cæsar. "Lord Cæsar" was a common term in the papyri and inscriptions. The Emperor cult was the chief religion of the Roman world in the time of Paul. Life was offered to Polycarp if he would only say "Lord Cæsar."¹ "No one is able to say 'Lord Jesus' except by the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:3). To confess Jesus as Lord was the mark of a true believer, a Christian in reality (Rom. 10:9). "God made this Jesus both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). "Christ the Lord" the angels said (Luke 2:11) the Saviour would be. It is not apotheosis or deification of Jesus that we here see, but the taking up of the humanity of Jesus into His deity with new glory, the glory of the humiliation, the glory of the accomplished redemption, the glory of the battle-scarred hero whose scars are his crown. It is all "to the glory of God the Father." The confession is for the glory of God. It is all of the Father's will and for His glory and gives Him joy. The glory of Jesus gives glory to the Father.

¹ Κύριος. Used in the Septuagint for Jehovah (Jahwe).

² Cf. C. Taylor, "Sayings of the Jewish Fathers," iv., 7.

³ ἵνα ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ πάντες γόνα κάμψῃ.

¹ Ἰησοῦς.

² καὶ πᾶσα γλῶσσα ἐξομολογήσεται ὅτι Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός.

¹ τί γὰρ κακόν ἐστιν. Κύριος Καῖσαρ; Martyrium Polycarpi, viii. 2.

VI

REALIZING GOD'S PLAN IN LIFE

(2: 12-18)

PAUL is eminently practical as well as really profound. He is equally at home in the discussion of the great problems of theology and in the details of the Christian life. He is a practical mystic who does not leave his mysticism in the clouds, but applies it to the problem in hand. There is in Paul no divorce between learning and life. Speculative theology as philosophy he knows and uses as a servant to convey his highest ideas, but he never forgets the ethics of the man in the street or at the desk. He has just written a marvellous passage on the Humiliation and Exaltation of Christ Jesus, scaling the heights of Christ's equality with God and sounding the depths of the human experience of Jesus, from the throne of God to the death on the Cross and back again. But Paul has no idea of leaving this great doctrinal passage thus. "So then,¹ my beloved,"² he goes on with an exhortation based on the experience of Christ. He returns to the practical note of 2:5. God has a plan in each of our lives as in that of Jesus. It is worth a great deal for us to recognize this blessed fact. Lightfoot puts it that as you have the example of Christ's humiliation to guide you and His exaltation to encourage you, so continue.

¹ ὥστε. On the use of ὥστε at the beginning of principal clauses (paratactic use) see Robertson, "Grammar," p. 999.

² ἀγαπητοί μου. Vulgate has carissimi mei.

1. Two Kinds of Obedience (verses 12^a).

Paul picks out the obedience of Christ in verse 8 ("obedient unto death"¹) as the point of contact for his exhortation. This sort of obedience is the result of listening or hearkening and not absolute obedience to authority.² The obedience that Paul commends in the Philippians is obedience to God, though he uses the word here absolutely. Certainly it is a remarkable compliment that Paul pays the church at Philippi. Technically here the structure³ of the sentence shows that the clause about presence and absence belongs to "work out." Still, the idea covers obedience also. The energy which Paul commands is a form of the obedience. So then we may apply the picture to that. Vincent objects that in such case Paul would say that the Philippians did better in his absence than in his presence. By implication he does say that. He directly affirms that they "always"¹ obeyed God. He exhorts energetic action "not as in my presence only,"² not mere "eye-service," when the master (or mistress) is present. They are not like children who obey till the mother's back is turned. Spurgeon tells of a servant girl who gave as the proof of her conversion that now she swept under the mats and behind the door. It is poor obedience that only does what will be noticed, as little as possible. Paul is not regarded as a mere moral policeman. The pastor is not a man simply to watch over the church and keep it in line. There are people who go to church only when the pastor is present and will notice their absence. The preacher is surely more than a spiritual watch-dog to bark at the sheep and keep them together. Obedience like that is very shallow and superficial.

¹ ὑπήκουος. Here ὑπηκούσατε. The use of ὑπό (sub) suggests reverent hearkening.

² πειθαρχεῖν.

³ μή goes with the imperative κατεργάζεσθε.

"But now much more is my absence."³ This is real obedience of the heart. It is the spirit of the workman who does his best work on the high ceiling where no one will see it save God. Paul urges this highest form of spiritual energy at the time when he is away. There are men who do their best work when left to their own initiative. This is true only of the choice spirits who listen to the voice of conscience. These are the salt of the earth who savour the whole lump. There are men and women in our churches who remain true when pastors come and go and when others fall away.

¹ πάντοτε.

² μὴ ὡς ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ μόνον. Note παρουσία the word used of the Second Coming.

³ ἀλλὰ νῦν πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἐν τῇ ἀπουσίᾳ. Note the pun παρουσία, ἀπουσία.

2. Working In and Working Out (verses 12^b f.).

In Paul's absence he desires that the Philippians shall press right on with the work of their own salvation in so far as the development is committed to their hands. The eye should rest upon the final goal and so Paul uses a verb¹ that puts the emphasis on the final result. Salvation² is used either of the entrance into the service of God, the whole process, or the consummation at the end. The Philippians are to carry into effect and carry on to the end the work of grace already begun. Peter (2 Pet. 1 : 10) likewise exhorted his readers to make their calling and election sure. They must not look to Paul to do their part in the work of their salvation. His absence cuts no figure in the matter of their personal responsibility. It is "your own³ salvation." It is the aim of all to win this goal at last. If so, each must look to his own task and do his own work. The social aspect of religion is true beyond a doubt. We are our brother's keeper and we do owe a debt of love and service to one another that we can never fully discharge (Rom. 13:8). But it is also true that each of us is his own keeper and stands or falls to God. Kipling has it thus: "For the race is run by one and one and never by two and two."

¹ κατ-εργάζεσθε. The perfective use of κατά.

² σωτηρίαν. Used also of safety. Cf. 1 : 18.

³ ἑαυτῶν. Not = ἀλλήλων, though grammatically possible. It is reflexive here, not reciprocal. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 689 f.

Work it out "with fear and trembling,"¹ Paul urges; "with a nervous and trembling anxiety to do right" (Lightfoot). People to-day do not tremble much in the presence of God and most have little sense of fear. Jonathan Edwards' great sermon on "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" finds little echo to-day. We live in a light-hearted and complacent age. The Puritans went too far to one extreme, but we are going too much to the other. We all need afresh a sense of solemn responsibility to Almighty God. Paul did not feel blindly complacent about himself (1 Cor. 9:27). Religion is both life and creed. The creed without the life amounts to little. We touch a hard problem here, to be sure, but Paul feels no incompatibility between the most genuine trust and the most energetic work. The two supplement or rather complement each other, though we cannot divide them. Divine sovereignty is the fundamental fact in religion with Paul. He starts with that. But human free agency is the inevitable corollary, as Paul sees it. The two are not inconsistent in his theology. Hence Paul is not a fatalist like the Essenes and the modern Hyper-Calvinists nor is he a mere Socinian like the Sadducees. The Pharisees held to both divine sovereignty and human free agency as most modern Christians do in varying degrees, to be sure. Paul seems to see no contradiction between them as Jesus did not (cf. Matt. 11:27 f.). All our modern efforts to explain the harmony between these two necessary doctrines fail, but we must hold them both true nevertheless. God must be supreme to be God at all. Man must be free to be man at all. The difficulty probably lies in our imperfect processes of reasoning for two such far-reaching truths. But Paul gives the divine sovereignty as the reason¹ or ground for the human free agency. He exhorts the Philippians to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling precisely because God works in them both the willing and the doing² and for His good pleasure. We can at least feel that the working of God's will has provided the whole plan of salvation in which we are included and at which we are at work. We toil in the sphere of God's will. But far more is true than that, though we are conscious also that our own wills have free play in this sphere. God presses His will upon ours. We feel the impact of the divine

¹ μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρόμου. The τρόμος strengthens the φόβος.

¹ γὰρ. Not so close and formal as ὅτι. Paratactic, not hypotactic.

² καὶ τὸ θέλειν καὶ τὸ ἐνεργεῖν. The articular infinitive singles out more sharply both activities. We need not press the difference between θέλω and βούλομαι.

energy upon our wills which are quickened into activity thereby. A child can grasp this, and rest upon it. A boy of four said joyfully to his mother, "When we do anything, it's really God doing it." So then in one sense God does it all. God is the one who energizes¹ in you both the impulse and the energy to carry out the impulse. No one knows what energy is. It is the scientific name for God. It is ceaseless as the sea, restless as the rapids of Niagara. One of the theories of matter is that all matter is in a vortex of inconceivable velocity, whirling round and round these bombarding electrons. What makes them whirl so? The particles of radium can be seen darting violently into space. We were dead in trespasses and sins till God's Spirit touched us and we leaped to life in Christ. This is the mystery of grace. They that are in the flesh cannot please God (Rom. 8:7 f.). God plants in our souls the germ of spiritual life and He does not let it die. His Spirit broods over us and energizes us to grow and work out what God has worked in us. This is the ground of hope and joy that makes Romans 8 so different from Romans 7. We are in league with God. God's grace is not an excuse for doing nothing. It is rather the reason for doing all. In religion as in nature we are co-workers with God. We plant the seed and plan the plant and hoe it and harvest it. But God gave us the seed and the soil and sends the rain and the sunshine and supplies that wondrous thing that we call life and makes it grow to perfection. "God has more life than anybody," said a child. It is idle to split hairs over our part and God's part. We must respond to the touch of God's Spirit else we remain dead in sin. Jesus is the author and the finisher of faith (Heb. 12: 2), of our faith, but we must believe all the same and keep on looking to Him, the goal of faith and endeavour. There is no higher standard of rectitude than God's good pleasure¹ by which He regulates our lives. Happy is the man who finds God's plan for his life and falls in with it.

¹ ὁ ἐνεργῶν. Works in or inworks. Note James' mention of energetic prayer (Jas. 5:16). Cf. Ἐνεργεῖσθαι in the New Testament by John Ross (Expositor, Jan., 1909).

3. Cheerfulness Under Orders (verse 14).

Having committed our lives to the control of God's will we are under orders. It is unmilitary and peevish to fret at God's commands. "Do all things² without murmurings."³ The allusion may be to the conduct of Israel in the wilderness (cf. Ex. 16: 7 ff.;

¹ εὐδοκία. Picture of serenity and power, common to the will of God.

² πάντα ποιεῖτε. Linear action. Habit.

³ Χωρὶς γογγυσμῶν. Onomatopoeic word like murmur. Ionic word as is the verb γογγύζω. The Athenians used τὸν θυρισμὸς. Cf. Thumb, "Hellenismus," p. 215. The verb occurs fairly often in the vernacular κοιτῆ. Moulton and Milligan, "Vocabulary," p. 130.

Num. 16: 5, 10). The Israelites murmured bitterly against Moses and against God repeatedly and with dire results. "Neither murmur ye, as some of them murmured,¹ and perished by the destroyer" (1 Cor. 10: 10). These inward murmurings against God's will would easily turn to grumbings towards each other. People do not usually stop with resentment against God, but wish to blame somebody. Disunion had already manifested itself in the church at Philippi. If God is supreme and does all things why did He allow this thing to happen? It is easier to ask than to answer that question. The next step is to become sour towards one another.

"Without disputings."² This word is used for questionings, then doubtings, then disputings. This is the usual course of our intellectual revolt against God. Probably the moral revolt (murmurings) comes first. The sceptical spirit follows resentment against some crossing of our will by God's will. The final result is "intellectual rebellion" (Lightfoot). Thoughts of hesitation³ or doubt turn to distrust. Distrust ripens into open disputes when a public stand is taken with others against God (cf. Hatch, "Essays in Biblical Greek," p. 8). Doubt leads to dispute even over trifles (Kennedy). So then, as good soldiers, Christians are to carry out the orders of the Captain of their salvation. Explanations, if they come at all, come after obedience, not before. Into the Valley of Death rode the Six Hundred.

¹ μηδὲ γογγύζετε, καθάπερ τινὲς αὐτῶν ἐγόγγυσαν.

² διαλογισμῶν.

³ The Vulgate has hæsitacionibus.

“Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.”

Soldiers go to the charge with a smile on their faces.

4. Perfection in the Midst of Imperfection (verses 15-16^a).

Paul here expresses his purpose¹ about the Philippians. It is a double purpose, their own highest development and the greatest service to others. The first is a prerequisite to the other, though they cannot be wholly separated. They are to “become”² “blameless and harmless.”³ They are not in the state of nature and do not easily become so in a state of grace. Certainly none are absolutely free from blame in the eye of God and men can usually find some fault with most of us. But, at any rate, we can give men as little ground as possible to pick flaws in our character. Whimsical critics cannot be satisfied, but we do have to regard the sober judgment of God’s people in ethical matters. Lightfoot takes “harmless” to refer to the intrinsic character as in Matthew

¹ ἵνα.

² γένησθε, not ἦτε.

³ ἄμεμπτοι καὶ ἀρέμτοι. Vulgate sine querula et simplices.

10:16 "harmless as doves." The word means literally "unmixed,"¹ "unadulterated" like pure milk or pure wine or unalloyed metal. In Romans 16:19 Paul says: "I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple² unto that which is evil," a noble motto for young and old. It is a great mistake to feel that one must know evil by experience in order to appreciate good. An unsullied character a man wants in his wife and the wife equally so in her husband. It is this sheer simplicity of character that is so delightful in children and, par excellence, in the "children of God"³ in the full spiritual import of this term. The children of Israel, when they murmured, were not acting like children of God. Paul here quotes⁴ Deuteronomy 32:5 and applies it to the Philippians. The children of Israel were full of blemish, while the Philippians are to be "without blemish"⁵ like the freewill offering (Lev. 22:21). The Israelites had themselves become "a crooked and perverse generation." But the Philippians must not fall to that low level, as they will if they give way to inward discontent. They must exhibit marks

¹ ἀ privative and κεράννυμι. The word occurs in the papyri.

² ἀκεραίους δὲ εἰς τὸ κακόν.

³ τέκνα θεοῦ. Both τέκνον and υἱός "signify a relation based on parentage" (Vincent). Both are used also in the ethical sense of the spiritual relation to God. Cf. Vincent, in loco.

⁴ οὐκ αὐτῷ τέκνα μωμητὰ, γενεὰ σκολιὰ καὶ διεστραμμένη.

⁵ ἄμωμα. Cf. Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Col. 1:22.

of perfection "in the midst¹ of a crooked and perverse generation." It is an indocile or froward and so "crooked"² (cf. Acts 2: 40; 1 Pet. 2: 18) generation. The word was used of crooked paths (Luke 3: 5) and so of crooked steps and crooked ways. The word "perverse"³ means twisted or distorted and is a bolder word like the Scotch "thrawn," with a twist in the inner nature (Kennedy). Surely our own generation is not without its moral twist and means many straight men when so many are crooked ("crooks"), twisted out of shape.

Paul changes his figure, but goes on with the same idea, "among whom ye are seen as lights in the world."⁴ These are the very people, the twisted and blinded by the darkness of sin, who need the light. Jesus is the real light of the world (John 8: 12), but the followers of Christ also pass on the torch and so bear light to others (Matt. 5: 14). Here the Philip-pians are pictured as "luminaries"⁵ rather than as lights⁶ in the world of darkness. As the moon and

¹ μέσον. Used as a preposition like so many other adverbs in the κοινή. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 644. See Epictetus, Bk. II, ch. xxii, § 10 for similar use of μέσον.

² σκολιᾶς. The opposite of ὀρθός.

³ διεστραμμένης. Perfect passive participle from διαστρέφω. Cf. Epictetus III, 6, 8 οἱ μὴ παντάπασι διεστραμμένοι τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

⁴ ἐν οἷς φαίνεσθε ὡς φωστῆρες ἐν κόσμῳ.

⁵ φωστῆρες. Cf. Gen. 1: 14, 16; Dan. 12: 3; Rev. 21: 11.

⁶ φῶτα. Cf. φῶς in Matt. 5: 14.

the stars "appear" ¹ in the night, so the Christians come out to give light in the darkness. In the dark night of sin the church of Philippi is a lighthouse in the breakers, "holding forth the word of life." ² The gospel has the principle of life in it. John's Gospel unites light and life as descriptive of the Logos (1:4) and Christ offers to men "the light of life" (John 8:12). Paul naturally blends the two figures here. Vincent rightly calls it "hypercritical" to change the figure in "holding forth." ³ "It is common to personify a luminary as a lightbearer." The figure can be either holding on to the word of life or presenting the word of life. In this latter sense one naturally thinks of the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbour, holding forth the torch of freedom. Every church is a lighthouse in a dark place. The darker the place the more the light is needed. It is sad to see so many churches deserting the down-town districts where they are so much needed. Rescue work must be carried on where sin has done its worst. It is like fighting the plague. Thank God for the men and women who do take the light into the dark corners of our cities. What would our modern cities be like without our churches? The answer is the cities of Japan, of China, of India to-day. The word of life quickens to life and brings light to the darkened soul.

¹ φαίνεσθε, not φαίνετε (shine).

² λόγον ζωῆς ἐπέχοντες.

³ ἐπέχοντες. Literally to hold upon or apply to and so fasten attention (Luke 14:7; Acts 3:5; 19:22).

5. Paul's Pride (verse 16^b).

"For a ground of glorying in the day of Christ."¹ This clause is related to all of verse 15 and the preceding part of 16. It is epexegetical or further purpose. The day of accounts comes to figure more largely in Paul's mind as he grows older (Kennedy). The writer of Hebrews speaks of the sleepless watch of the shepherds of souls "as they that shall give account; that they may do this with joy, and not with grief; for this were unprofitable for you" (Heb. 13: 17). Paul longs² to have "whereof to glory³ in the day of Christ." The success of the Philippians will give Paul something tangible to present to Christ. They will be stars in his crown. He means by "day of Christ" the judgment day, commonly termed the day of the Lord outside of this Epistle. Paul does not wish to be saved "so as by fire" with all his works gone (1 Cor. 3: 15). When that day comes and Paul looks back upon his work in Philippi, he does wish to feel "that I did not run in vain neither labour in vain." He has the metaphor⁴ of the stadium before him as in Galatians 2: 2 when he expresses the

¹ εἰς καύχημα ἔμολ' εἰς ἡμέραν χριστοῦ. Note both uses of εἰς. No reason for saying "until" the day.

² ἔμολ' is the ethical dative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 536, 539.

³ καύχημα is result.

⁴ ἔδραμον. The race.

same dread about the Galatians. He does not wish it all to come to nothingness. The word for labour¹ here means the weariness of labour. Toil and sweat and weariness were all for naught. It is a pitiful case when the preacher has to see the people go back to the flesh-pots of Egypt and leave his work null and void. The Philippians will be Paul's jewels in the presence of Christ as the mother of the Gracchi boasted of her boys.

6. Paul's Sacrifice (verse 17^a).

"Yea, though² I am offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith," Paul adds. He will not shrink from death in order to be of service to them and to help them in their efforts to press on in the Christian life. He hopes to live, but he stands in the constant presence of death, and he is not afraid. He had faced death at Philippi and often since. It will come some day. He is ready now. It is not his apostolic office, but his very life that he offers. The picture here is of their faith³ in the sense of their Christian life as a sacrifice⁴ and priestly service.⁵ The Philip-

¹ ἐκοπίασα. From κόπος exhausting toil (1 Cor. 15 : 10 ; Gal. 4 : 11). In Rev. 14 : 13 see distinction drawn between ἔργα (works) and κόπων (toils).

² εἰ καὶ. "Even if" would be καὶ εἰ as some manuscripts have it.

³ πίστεως.

⁴ θυσία.

⁵ λειτουργία. From λαός and ἔργον, work for the people. Cf. our "liturgy."

prians as priests lay down upon the altar their Christian lives (faith and fidelity). Upon¹ this Paul is ready to pour out² his own life as an additional sacrifice in their service. It is not necessary to press the point whether Paul has in mind the Jewish custom of pouring the drink offering around the altar or the heathen of pouring the libation upon the altar. The latter would be more familiar to the Philippians, but the point holds good in either case. Paul is willing to spend and be spent in the service of the Philippians (cf. 2 Cor. 12: 15³). One thinks of the student volunteers who offer their lives for mission service and challenge the churches to furnish the money for their support. One thinks of David Livingstone who gave his life gladly for the healing of the open sore of the world in Africa.

7. Mutual Joy (verses 17^b-18).

"I joy and rejoice⁴ with you all," says Paul. He is glad by himself to make the offering of his life, if this supreme sacrifice is demanded. He will not shrink back, but will meet it gladly, and all the more readily since he can share his joy with them. Fel-

¹ ἐπί.

² σπένδομαι. The verb is used in the libelli (certificates of pagan worship). Those who poured out libations to the gods obtained immunity. Cf. Milligan, "Selections from the Greek Papyri," pp. 114-116.

³ δαπανήσω καὶ ἐκ δαπανηθήσομαι.

⁴ Χαίρω καὶ συγχαίρω. The point in the repetition is συγ —

lowship is a blessed reality. Paul is glad on his own account that he has been the instrument in their salvation (Kennedy). He is still more joyful at the experiences of grace which they have in Christ. Joy is not selfish, but wishes company. The woman in Luke 15:9 who found her lost piece of money called in her women friends and said: "Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost." So the shepherd who found the one lost sheep said to his friends: "Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost" (Luke 15:6). So the father says: "Make merry, for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found" (Luke 15:24). The child all aglow with his Christmas toys wishes other children to come and share his joys. "And in the same manner¹ do ye also joy, and rejoice with me." Play up to your part of the joy. Plutarch² tells of the messenger from Marathon who expired on the first threshold in Athens with these words on his lips: "Rejoice and we rejoice."³ Nowhere in the Epistle is Paul so insistent about joy as here. The Christian is rich in his joy in Christ. What joy it will be in heaven to tell the story of the triumph of Christ over sin in your life and in mine.

¹ τὸ δὲ αὐτὸ. Adverbial accusative (of general reference). Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 487.

² Mor., p. 347 C.

³ Χαίρετε καὶ χαίρομεν.

VII

FELLOWSHIP

(2 : 19-30)

MUCH as Paul loved doctrine, he also greatly loved people. He had a passion for folks and had hosts of friends wherever he laboured and even where he had not been as Romans 16 shows. Dan Crawford, the remarkable missionary of Central Africa and author of "Thinking Black," speaks quaintly of fishing in the eyes of his friends. Paul knew how to do that and dearly loved the fellowship of the saints. We have many glimpses of his personal relationships in the Acts and in his Epistles. Paul had the most delightful ties with his fellow-workers. He had foes in plenty, but he also made friends fast and true. In the midst of this Epistle Paul talks in a charming way about his plans for communicating with the Philippians, a human touch that breaks the strain of theological argument. This Epistle seems to have no formal or logical order.¹ It flows along in the most easy and natural way and treats the weightiest topics and the most incidental with equal ease and grace.

¹ Clemen ("Einheitlichkeit der paulin. Briefe," p. 138) thinks that verses 19-21 do not belong here, but that is hypercriticism in a letter like this.

1. Paul's Plans for Timothy (verses 19-23).

He writes as the Master about the disciple. Timothy has evidently placed himself wholly at Paul's service in the matter of going or not going to Philippi. Perhaps the Philippians had wondered why Paul had not sent them more frequent messages. So then he writes in an apologetic vein about his conduct in the matter.

(a) Timothy's Interest in the Philippians (verses 19-21). The possibility of Paul's martyrdom (Phil. 2 : 17) was only a remote one and did not interfere with his plans for sending word to Philippi. Paul has a very definite hope to send Timothy "shortly"¹ to them, though how soon he cannot tell. His hope is centered "in the Lord Jesus."² This favourite Pauline idiom is not a mere pious phrase, but represents the very core of Paul's philosophy of life. Jesus is the circumference of all his thoughts and activities. Christ is both the center and the circumference of the circle of life for Paul. Christ is the key to the universe and to Paul's own life. He has no life outside of Christ (cf. 1 : 8, 14 ; 2 : 24 ; 3 : 1 ; Rom.

¹ ταχέως. The use of the aorist infinitive πέμψαι after ἐλπίζω rather than the future is in accord with κοινή usage. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 1081 f.

² ἐν Κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ.

9:1; 14:14, etc.). Evidently Paul had tried to send messengers to Philippi, but had been unable to do so. Epaphroditus had been here in Rome a good while and Paul had grown anxious about the Philippians, "that I also may be of good cheer, when I know your state."¹ He himself will be of good spirit, good heart, good courage. He needed the good cheer that would come from good news about them.

His reason for wishing to send Timothy in particular is plainly given: "For I have no man like-minded, who will care truly for your state." He means, of course, one like-minded² with Timothy. This is high tribute to the fidelity and disinterestedness of Timothy who richly deserved it. He was such a friend that³ he would be genuinely⁴ anxious⁵ about the Philippians. He was Paul's companion and helper in the establishment of the Philippian church. Besides, like Paul, he had the shepherd heart and knew what anxiety for all the churches was (2 Cor. 11:28), a daily pressure⁶ upon Paul's

¹ ἵνα καὶ γὰρ ἐνψυχῶ γνοῦς τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν. This verb is rare (but cf. Josephus, Ant. XI, 6, 8), save that ἐνψύχει is common in epitaphs. But ἐνψυχος is in 1 Macc. 9:14; 2 Macc. 7:20; 14:18. Γνοῦς here is ingressive aorist, come to know.

² ἰσόψυχον. It is a rare word. Cf. Æschylus, Agam. 1470 and Psalm 54 (55):14 (13). Vulgate has unanimem.

³ ὅστις almost consecutive (certainly sub-final) here. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 996.

⁴ γνησίως. By birth relation, naturally, sincerely.

⁵ μεριμνήσει. Common word for anxiety (cf. Matt. 6:25).

⁶ ἐπίστασις. A load standing or staying upon Paul's soul.

heart. No other preacher is really worth while. The minister who is out for money will not win souls and feed them. The man who puts his own selfish interests before the Kingdom of God will not have the sacrificial spirit. Paul has a hard word to add: "For they all seek their own, not the things of Christ."¹ This is a very severe indictment of the rest of Paul's friends in Rome. We do not know all the circumstances. Perhaps Paul is only speaking of those who were in a position to make the long (for that time) trip from Rome to Philippi and back. It is possible that Luke and Aristarchus were absent from the city at this time. Paul is a man of quick impulses and we may have here a pessimistic note in this optimistic letter. The very exceptional consecration of Timothy set in relief the hesitation of the rest. But there is small wonder (Kennedy) that Paul should feel hurt at the lack of inclination on the part of any of his friends save Timothy to make the sacrifice of time and energy necessary for the journey. "The whole number," says Paul, put their own interests before the interests of Christ. Augustine says that Paul's companions here in Rome were mercenary. Paul certainly loved Luke, the beloved physician (Col. 4: 14), and it is hard to think of him as mercenary and selfish. He was, as already suggested, probably out of town. It may be urged by some that Paul allowed himself to go too far in interpreting his own eagerness to hear from Philippi as the clear will of God. Certainly the interpretation of Providence is not always easy. More than one angle of vision is often possible. But, after all, it is amazing what good excuses men can find for doing their own way, the easy way, in a crisis rather than the hard way which may be God's way. If the duty seems unpleasant, we often seek reasons for thinking that it is not duty at all. At any rate, one is not wide of the mark if he says that nothing so hinders the effectiveness of our churches as just this tendency to put our own interests before those of the Kingdom of God. Many a pastor is dreary and despondent as he faces progressive enterprises in the church work because so many ask to be excused. They say that they really do not have time. These stern words of Paul come to one's mind, if not his lips, at a time like that. But Paul is not a man to be blocked by the refusal of men to do the work that is called for. If one way fails, there is always another way open.

¹ οἱ πάντες γὰρ τὰ ἑαυτῶν ζητοῦσιν, οὐ τὰ χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ.

(b) Timothy's Devotion to Paul (verse 22). Paul has no need to tell the Philippians about Timothy, whose character is in such contrast¹ to "the all" who put their own interests first. "Ye know (by experience² as seen in Acts 16 and 17) the proof

¹ δὲ. Adversative here, not continuative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1186.

² γινώσκετε, not οἴδατε.

(approved character¹) of him." When put to the test in Philippi, Timothy proved true. His love and loyalty they well know and they need only a reminder to bring it all back to them. Paul starts to say that, as a child served a father,² so Timothy served³ me, but his refined feeling and instinctive humility (Kennedy) and delicacy lead Paul to change the structure of the sentence. He is checked also by the thought (Vincent) that both he and Timothy are servants of Christ (Phil. 1 : 1). So he says: "served with me"⁴ as father and son in the common cause, side by side, "in the gospel" or "for the gospel"⁵ however we take it. Either is possible and either sphere or purpose makes sense. The feeling of camaraderie and companionship is uppermost in Paul's mind. Timothy and Paul have served together in the trenches as comrades in the army of Christ. Paul elsewhere bears hearty testimony to the service of Timothy as "my beloved child and faithful in the Lord" (1 Cor. 4 : 17), "for he does the work of the Lord as I also" (1 Cor. 16 : 10). Cf. also 1 Tim. 1 : 2 ; 2 Tim. 1 : 2. This devotion was all the more appreciated by Paul if we admit that Timothy was not vigorous in health

¹ δοκιμὴν. Used for process of trial (2 Cor. 8 : 2) and result of trial (2 Cor. 2 : 9) and here (Vincent). Vulgate has experimentum.

² ὡς πατρὶ τέκνον.

³ ἐδοῦλευσεν. Figure of slave (δοῦλος) and master.

⁴ σὺν ἐμοί.

⁵ εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 591 f.

and had a natural timidity of disposition. His loyalty was unimpeachable. He stood ready to serve Christ anywhere.

(c) Paul's Need of Timothy (verse 23). As things are with Paul now in Rome, he cannot spare Timothy till the cloud has vanished and Paul is free again. Then he will dispatch Timothy instantly, for he knows that the Philippians will wish to know how it goes with Paul.¹ Paul here resumes the standpoint of verse 19. Meanwhile Paul needs Timothy by his side and can only cherish the hope of sending him soon. Then he can tell about the outcome of the trial.

2. Paul's Trust About Himself (verse 24).

He has a hope² of sending Timothy, a trust³ in the Lord (cf. 1:14; 2:19) of coming himself soon.⁴ There is a curious parallel in Paul's language about his proposed visit to Corinth after he had sent Timothy thither: "But I shall come to you shortly, if the Lord will" (1 Cor. 4:19). If Paul ¹ τὰ περὶ ἐμέ, the things concerning me. The use of ὡς ἂν as a temporal conjunction occurs also in Rom. 15:24; 1 Cor. 11:34. It occurs in the papyri. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 974. The aspirated form ἀφ' ἃ is here correct and is amply supported in the papyri. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 224, and Lightfoot, in loco. Ἐξωτερῆς occurs chiefly in Acts. The Vulgate has max.

² ἐλπίζω.

³ πείθομαι. Second perfect, state of confidence.

⁴ ταχέως. Shortly or swiftly.

wrote Philippians before Colossians, Ephesians and Philemon, he was not able to come right away, but only after a year or so. We do not know precisely what Paul's expectations were about this "shortly." The whim of a Nero was an elusive thing to count upon. But he no longer thinks of going on to Spain first as he had once planned (Rom. 15 : 28). His heart now turns to the east (Phile. 22). His long imprisonment in Cæsarea and Rome has made it necessary for Paul to set things in order in the east. The Gnostic disturbers had already appeared on the horizon before Paul left Asia (Acts 20 : 29 f.). These "grievous wolves" had taken full advantage of Paul's absence to play havoc with the flock in various parts of Asia. Philippi also tugs at Paul's heart which now definitely turns eastward. When he was released, it seems probable that he did go east at once. We catch traces of Paul's tracks at Miletus (2 Tim. 4 : 20), Ephesus (1 Tim. 1 : 3), Macedonia and so probably Philippi (1 Tim. 1 : 3), Troas (2 Tim. 4 : 13), Nicopolis (Titus 3 : 12). We may believe therefore that in time the Philippians did see Paul again as well as Timothy who was certainly in the east (1 Tim. 1 : 3).

3. The Immediate Return of Epaphroditus (verses 25-30).

The way is clear for this at any rate and now at last. For long this boon seemed remote if not impossible. But God has been good to Epaphroditus, to Paul, and to the Philippians in sparing the life of this good man. So Epaphroditus is to go at once as the bearer of this Epistle and of Paul's love and blessing.

(a) His Return Necessary (verses 25 f.). His "hopes" aside, Paul faces ¹ the immediate necessity ² of sending Epaphroditus at once. It is important for Paul to keep in vital touch with the work lest it languish and die, but the special reason for the urgency is the anxiety of Epaphroditus and theirs about him as Paul explains. There is no reason for confusing this Epaphroditus of Philippi with Epaphras of Colossæ (Col. 1:7; 4:12; Phile. 23), even if the latter is a shortened form of the other name,³ for the name in both forms is common enough all over the empire. There is nothing in the tradition that this Epaphroditus was Nero's secretary, due to allusions in Suetonius (Nero, 49; Domitian, 14). Paul describes him as his brother ⁴ in the Christian brotherhood, as his fellow-worker ⁵ in the cause of Christ, as his fellow-soldier ⁶ in the conflict with Christ's enemies. He is

¹ ἡγησάμην is epistolary aorist like ἔπεμψα in verse 28. Proof also that Epaphroditus bore the Epistle.

² ἀναγκαῖον. Cf. 2 Cor. 9:5 for same idiom.

³ Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 172; Lightfoot, in loco.

⁴ ἀδελφόν.

⁵ συνεργόν.

⁶ συνστρατιώτην. Cf. Philemon 2. Very common metaphor with Paul. Moulton and Milligan ("Lexical Notes," Expositor, Sept., 1911) quote from BU 814²⁷ (iii. A. D.) κέκρημαι χαλκόν π[α]ρὰ συστρατιώτου when a soldier in a letter to his mother says: "I have borrowed money from a fellow soldier."

Paul's comrade in love, in work, and in peril, "common sympathy, common work, common danger" (Lightfoot). But the Philippians regard him as their "apostle" ¹ or "messenger" to Paul as he was in truth and also their "minister," ² "sacrificial minister" it almost turned out to be, to Paul's need. He rendered a priestly service at any rate. Epaphroditus brought their gifts (Phil. 4: 18) which Paul there calls a "sacrifice" ³ as in 2: 30 a "service," ⁴ an oblation to God.⁵ The qualifications of Epaphroditus for service to both Paul and the Philippians are thus excellent. He was not the equal in gifts to Timothy, but Paul used gladly the services of less gifted men. Not all men can be leaders and pioneers. Moses had Aaron, Luther had Melancthon (cf. Baskerville, in loco).

But Paul had a specific reason ⁶ for sending Epaphroditus now. The simple truth was that Epaphroditus was intensely homesick. "He longed after you all" ⁷ with yearning pothos and pathos. He "was

¹ ἀπόστολον. Here in the original and general sense of the word, not one of the Twelve or like Paul (cf. 2 Cor. 8: 23).

² λειτουργόν.

³ θυσίαν.

⁴ λειτουργίας.

⁵ On Paul's use of pagan terms see Ramsay, Exp. Times, X, 1-5.

⁶ ἐπειδὴ. Only in three other places in Paul's Epistles. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 965.

⁷ ἐπιποθῶν ἡν. Periphrastic imperfect adds to the notion of continuance. Note ἐπι — Cf. Phil. 1: 8. It is a strong word.

sore troubled " ¹ in anguish of heart, either from disgust at the situation or from a real case of homesickness. At any rate he was sick at heart now " because ye had heard that he was sick." ² It is a common feeling for the sick to conceal the serious nature of the illness from their loved ones so as to avoid giving pain. Perhaps the Philippians on hearing of the illness of Epaphroditus had written Paul a letter about it. If so, Paul was now replying to that letter. As it was, the heart of Epaphroditus was pierced to the quick with anxiety. This touch of human sympathy is life itself.

(b) The Recent Peril of Epaphroditus (verse 27). Paul has put the thing too mildly, " for indeed " ³ (really) " he was sick nigh unto death." ⁴ What this sickness was we do not know. Epaphroditus may have run great risk on his way to Rome. He may have come in the hot season and have caught the terrible Roman fever, a plague yet in spite of our knowledge of the mosquito. Some have suggested that Paul was more closely confined after the arrival

¹ ἀδημῶν. The etymology is wholly conjectural whether from ἀδημος (away from home) or from ἀδήμων (distressed).

² διότι ἡκούσατε ὅτι ἠσθένησεν. Note διότι (causal) and ὅτι (declarative) and the two aorists. He " fell sick " (ingressive aorist).

³ καὶ γὰρ. Ascensive force of καὶ. Cf. Robertson, " Grammar," p. 1181.

⁴ παραπλήσιον θανάτου. Most MSS. read θανάτῳ, but W H follow B P here. Cf. Robertson, " Grammar," p. 646. Cf. also p. 203 for change of ω and ου.

of Epaphroditus who had more exposure. But, whatever the cause, God took pity¹ on Epaphroditus and, Paul adds with delicacy of feeling, "on me also,"² and in particular, "that I might not have sorrow upon sorrow"³ as if wave upon wave of woe would overwhelm Paul with a flood, Epaphroditus' death piled upon Paul's imprisonment. That would be more than Paul could stand. Isaiah spoke of "tribulation upon tribulation,"⁴ the Psalms of Solomon of "sin upon sin,"⁵ and Jesus of "stone upon stone."⁶ We have a proverb about trouble: "It never rains, but it pours." But that is the philosophy of pessimism. The waves did stop rolling over Paul and Epaphroditus was spared.

(c) Welcome for Epaphroditus (verses 28 f.). The final recovery of Epaphroditus, added to the anxiety of the Philippians, led Paul to speed⁷ in sending⁸ him to the Philippians, to more⁹ eagerness on Paul's part

¹ ἀλλὰ ὁ θεὸς ἡλέησεν. ² οὐκ αὐτὸν μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐμέ.

³ ἵνα μὴ λύπην ἐπὶ λύπην σχῶ.

⁴ 28: 10 θλίψιν ἐπὶ θλίψιν.

⁵ 3: 7 ἁμαρτίαν ἐπὶ ἁμαρτίαν.

⁶ Matt. 24: 2 λίθος ἐπὶ λίθον. The MSS. vary here in Phil. 2: 27 between λύπη and λύπην with ἐπί. Either makes good sense. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 602, 604. Note punctiliar idea in σχῶ, get.

⁷ οὖν. Therefore, because of the circumstance.

⁸ ἔπεμψα. Epistolary aorist.

⁹ σπουδαιότερως. There is no reason for taking this comparative as a positive or even as a superlative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 664 f. The object of comparison is implied.

than he would have had. He has lost no time in getting Epaphroditus off, "that, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice."¹ Paul is anxious for the Philippians to recover their cheerfulness which had been clouded by the sickness of Epaphroditus. Their joy will react on Paul and make him happy. The best way to be happy is to make others happy. "And that I may be less sorrowful"² than I have been. Paul states his own joy euphemistically. He understands the yearning of Epaphroditus and the anxiety of the Philippians. "Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is caused to stumble and I burn not?" (2 Cor. 11: 29).

"Receive him therefore in the Lord with all joy."³ Give him a royal welcome. The command seems superfluous, but none the less Paul makes it. He only wishes he could have a share in it. We may be sure that the Philippians did this thing and took Epaphroditus to their hearts. He had come back from the very grave and deserved a conqueror's welcome. He had been a hero of faith. "Hold such in honour."⁴ This plea for the proper esteem and treatment of soldiers of the cross is not without point to-day. Certainly preachers get their share

¹ ἵνα ἰδόντες αὐτὸν πάλιν χαρῇτε.

² καὶ γὰρ ἀλυπότερος ὢ.

³ προσδέχεσθε οὖν αὐτὸν μετὰ πάσης χαρᾶς. A continuous welcome (present tense).

⁴ τοὺς τοιούτους ἐντίμους ἔχετε. Keep on doing so (present tense).

of public esteem and criticism. They are outstanding targets and cannot escape a certain amount of rough handling which is not wholly bad. As a rule preachers get what love they deserve and often more. It is well to insist that ministers deserve due appreciation because of the high and holy task committed to them, particularly if they do their duty steadily and faithfully. But, as a rule, preachers are paid a pitiful salary and are expected to live on less than most other people with economy and good appearances. There is something better than monuments and that is right treatment while they live. In particular, one may note with pleasure the endowment funds for aged ministers now under way in most of the denominations. That is the least that can be done and it ought to be done. Any decent nation takes care of its old soldiers.

(d) Risking All for the Work of Christ (verse 30). Epaphroditus deserves the welcome of a hero "because for the work of Christ he came nigh unto death."¹ Already "the work" was getting a technical meaning like "the way," "the name." It signified "the cause" of Christ² and Paul used it absolutely³ in Acts 15:38 about John Mark who "went not with them to the work." The courage of Epaphroditus stands over against the timidity of John Mark. Witness the heroes of faith in Revelation 12:11 who "loved not their life even unto death." It is possible to be too careful of one's own life at the cost of real usefulness. One does not wish to be foolhardy, but soldiers dare danger as do doctors and drummers and all sorts of men. So Epaphroditus really hazarded¹ his life for the work of Christ. Paul uses here a gambler's phrase. Epaphroditus gambled with his life in the risk that he ran in coming to Rome, either from the Roman fever or Nero's wrath or some unknown peril. The early Christians called those who risked their lives for Christ "Parabolani" or "the Riskers," the brotherhood of those who dared all for Christ as Aquila and Priscilla risked their necks for Paul (Rom. 16:4). Charles Kingsley pictures these "Riskers" for the souls of men in Hypatia. Epaphroditus did this to fill up² what was lacking³ in the service⁴ of the Philippians for Paul. They could not come themselves in person and could only send their love by proxy.

¹ ὅτι διὰ τὸ ἔργον Χριστοῦ μέχρι θανάτου ἤγγισεν. Note causal conjunction ὅτι and preposition διὰ.

² Many MSS. have Κυρίου.

³ As Ignatius does in Eph. 14, Rom. 3.

¹ παραβολευσάμενος τῇ ψυχῇ. The verb παραβολεύομαι is from the adjective παράβολος rash, reckless, gambling. Cf. παραβαλίσθαι ταῖς ψυχαῖς in Diod. 3, 36, 4. In Roman law the appellant deposited a stake (παράβολον) which he forfeited if he lost his case. Deissmann ("Light from Ancient East," p. 84) cites the verb from an inscription of II cent. A. D. in sense of exposing oneself.

² ἀναπληρώσῃ. Cf. Col. 1:24. Fill up to the brim.

³ ὀστέρημα. No reproach in this term.

⁴ λειτουργίας. Sacrificial service.

But Epaphroditus dared all and did this sacrificial service which Paul would never forget. "For that which was lacking on your part they supplied" (1 Cor. 16: 17; cf. 2 Cor. 11: 9). Paul's feeling towards the Corinthians is repeated in the case of the Philippians.

VIII
THE HOLY QUEST
(3:1-14)

THIS paragraph challenges comparison with the great one in 2:1-11 concerning the Person of Christ. Here the Passion of Paul for likeness to Christ is expressed with the utmost energy and yearning of his soul. Nowhere does his mysticism find a nobler statement. Paul is greatest when his intellect is set on fire with love for Christ. No Knight in search of the Holy Grail ever had such elevation of feeling as Paul here reveals. This is the true chivalry, the Passion for Christ.

1. Repetition of the Commonplace (verses 1-3).

It is possible that Paul at first meant to conclude his letter at this point, when he wrote "finally," brethren," though that is by no means the necessary meaning of his language. The phrase literally means "what is left," "the rest" as in 1 Thessalonians 4:1; 2 Thessalonians 3:1. It may mean "henceforth" as in Mark 14:41; 1 Corinthians 7:29; 2 Timothy 4:8. It may mean only "now" (jam) or "therefore" as in Matthew 26:45; Acts 27:20. The meaning "finally" is also correct as in 2 Corinthians 13:11. On the whole I incline to the view that Paul did not mean to close the Epistle, but simply turns to the remaining topics before him with the repetition of "rejoice."¹ Lightfoot translates by "farewell," a possible, though not probable rendering. Joy is the dominant note in the Epistle so far and it rings on to the end. But the refrain is joy "in the Lord" as Paul so often says about all his experiences.

¹ τὸ λοιπόν. The case is accusative of extent of time. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 470. For the use of λοιπόν like οὖν see p. 1146. For a similar use in Epictetus see Class. Review, III, p. 71.

The next sentence puzzles the commentators no little: "To write the same things to you,² to me indeed is not irksome, but for you it is safe." To what does Paul refer? Is it the repetition of "rejoice" in this same Epistle? To keep on writing this message is not tedious³ to me, "but for you it is safe."⁴ It makes you steadfast, or stable, able to stand. Does Paul refer to a previous letter in which he gave warnings which he now repeats? That is possible, though not certain.⁵ Paul did write letters which we do not

¹ χαίρετε. Cf. 2:18; 4:4.

² τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν ὑμῖν. Note linear action (present infinitive).

³ δκνηρόν. From δκνέω, to hesitate. Means sluggish, slothful, "poky," tiresome. Does not make me tired. Cf. Matt. 25:26; Rom. 12:11.

⁴ ἀσφαλές. Not to trip or to fall.

⁵ Polycarp's use of ἐπιστολαί (ad Phil. iii.) does not prove it as the plural was sometimes applied to single letters.

now possess (1 Cor. 5:9; 2 Cor. 10:10f.; 2 Thess. 2:15; 3:17). Whatever it is, Paul repeats it with a slight apology. Every speaker has a certain hesitancy in repeating things to the same audience, though it is more or less necessary if one is to be effective. Particularly do teachers find repetition necessary. Some people are almost immune to new ideas. They must be taught line upon line, precept upon precept. It is not pleasant to speak to people who do not care to hear. It is easier to write, but even so the edge of expectancy is dulled. But Paul is sustained by the great need of his warning on the part of the Philippians and goes right on.

It is quite possible that the tendency to dissension in the Philippians to which he has already several times alluded was complicated with the Judaizing heresy since Paul proceeds to warn his readers against the Judaizers in very pointed language. If so, it was eminently "safe" for the Philippians for Paul to repeat his warnings against these subtle and dangerous teachers. Three times with striking repetition "in the intense energy of his invective" (Kennedy) Paul makes his warning: "Beware, beware, beware."¹ It is more exactly "look out for,"² rather than "beware of," though that idea naturally follows.

¹ βλέπετε, βλέπετε, βλέπετε.

² With accusative τοὺς κύνας (as in 2 John 8) rather than with ἀπό (as in Mark 8:15). Cf. 2 Chron. 10:16 and Robertson, "Grammar," p. 471.

He is not describing three classes of opponents, but only one by the use of "the dogs, the evil workers, the concision." There can only be one group whom Paul would so picture and that is the Judaizers whom Paul had already termed "false apostles, deceitful workers, fashioning themselves into apostles of Christ" (2 Cor. 11:13). If one is shocked at Paul's use of the word dogs¹ for the Judaizers, he may be reminded that this was the common description of the Gentiles by the Jews. A Jew was forbidden to bring the price of a dog into the house of God to pay a vow (Deut. 23:18). Jesus Himself, though in a more or less playful vein, employed the word for "little dogs,"² of the Gentiles in speaking to the Syro-Phœnician woman (Matt. 15:26) and she took no offence at it, but took it up as a pleasantry with the retort about "the little dogs" eating the crumbs under their masters' table (15:27). So then Paul is here but retorting to the Judaizers who are the real spiritual dogs while the Gentiles have understood the truth about Christ. Dogs were the common scavengers in the Oriental cities and were considered very unclean by Jews for obvious reasons. In Revelation 22:15 the term "dogs" is applied to those "whose impurity excludes them from the heavenly city" (Vincent). We need not split hairs over the precise point in the impurity that Paul means to bring out, whether shamelessness, insolence, cunning, greediness, roving tendencies and howling, snappishness. Certainly these Judaizing dogs had dogged Paul's steps all over the empire, snapping at his heels and barking after him at a distance. At any rate the moral impurity of the Judaizers is the subject of Paul's contempt. Look out for these dogs, for they will bite. Cave canem. That sign appears at the gate where dangerous dogs are to be found. These "dogs" are also "evil workers."¹ They are actively at work, but in the wrong direction. They are busy doing wrong, fine specimens of wasted energy. Paul calls them "hucksters"² in 2 Corinthians 2:17 with the implication of corruption and fraud so often true of those who put the best apples on the top of the barrel, the prettiest strawberries on the top of the basket. These Judaizers, like the Pharisees before them, compassed sea and land to make one proselyte and made him twofold more a son of hell than they were (Matt. 23:15). Once more Paul speaks of the Judaizers as "the concision."³ They had mutilated the ordinance of circumcision in making it essential to salvation. Christians are the true circumcision as Paul states elsewhere (Rom. 2: 25-29; Eph. 2: 11; Col. 2: 11), the circumcision of the heart which was symbolized by that of the flesh.

¹ τοὺς κύνας.

² τὰ κυνάρια.

¹ τοὺς κακὰς ἐργάτας. Cf. ἐργάται δόλιοι in 2 Cor. 11:13. Crooked sticks at best.

² καπηλεύοντες.

³ τὴν κατατομήν. The word in the LXX is used only of mutilations as in Lev. 21:5; 1 Kings 18:28. The annominatio here of κατατομή, περιτομή, is a common figure with Paul (cf. Rom. 12:3; 2 Thess. 3:11). Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1201. These plays on words are common. An ambassador to Spain said he was sent not to Spain, but to Pain. Coleridge called French philosophy "psilosophy."

Paul gives three reasons for holding that Christians are the real circumcision. We "worship by the Spirit of God." This is the probable translation. The word¹ is the one used for ritual worship, but it means here the true worship of God who is spirit (John 4: 24) with our spirits by the help of the Spirit of God. Then again true Christians "glory in Christ Jesus."² This word glory or exult "expresses with great vividness the high level of Christian life" (Kennedy) and belongs to Paul's "triumphant mood." Once more, "we do not put our trust in the flesh."³ By "flesh" here Paul means the unrenewed human nature, not in the state of grace, even if one is observing ritual ceremonies. It is a vivid picture of the mere ceremonialist who is unsaved. This use of "flesh" is common in Galatians and Romans (cf. Rom. 8: 4-8). In Galatians 5: 2-6 Paul places the mere ceremonialist outside of Christ.

2. Religious Pride (verses 4-6).

This pride of religion was at bottom the cause of the ¹ λατρῶοντες.

² καυχώμενοι ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. Cf. Rom. 2: 17; 1 Cor. 1: 31; 2 Cor. 10: 17; Gal. 6: 14.

³ καὶ οὐκ ἐν σαρκὶ πεποιθότες.

hatred of Paul by the Jews and the Judaizers. There is much of it to-day, alas. John the Baptist smote it hip and thigh when the proud Pharisees and Sadducees came to hear him down by the Jordan. "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father" (Matt. 3:9). Instead of being the spiritual children of Abraham by reason of ecclesiastical privileges John called them a brood of vipers as did Jesus later (Matt. 12:34) and also children of the devil (John 8:44). Paul understands perfectly the standpoint of these Pharisaic disciples. He had been there himself and once gloried in all the things on which they now pride themselves. He had once before made out an ironical bill of particulars in ridicule of their carnal religious pride (2 Cor. 11:16-30), once when he played the fool for Christ's sake, "that I also may glory a little." So now he has as much right to boast of his Jewish prerogatives as the Judaizers, "though I myself might have confidence even in the flesh."¹ Paul appreciates to the full the dignity of being a Jew (Rom. 3:1 f.). He places himself for the moment at the Jewish standpoint. "Seeing that many glory after the flesh, I will glory also" (2 Cor. 11:18). He is here speaking "foolishly" and "not after the Lord." "If any other man thinketh to have confidence in the flesh, I yet more."¹ "If they arrogate to themselves these carnal privileges, I also arrogate them to myself" (Lightfoot). I have as much right to do it as the Judaizers.

¹ καίπερ ἔγωγ ἔχων πεποιθήσιν καὶ ἐν σαρκί. Concessive clause with καίπερ and the participle. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1129.

Paul now proceeds to prove the point of his argumentum ad hominem. There is here the same depth of feeling on Paul's part as in 2 Corinthians 11:21, but less tumultuous eagerness and a more subdued tone (Lightfoot). There is undoubtedly "a certain natural pride in recounting his hereditary privileges" (Kennedy), a pride exhibited even in the sadness of heart with which they are recounted in Romans 9:3-5. "In circumcision eight days old."² This was according to Jewish custom and Paul was thus an orthodox Israelite (Gen. 17:12; Lev. 12:3). Circumcision was practiced in Egypt and the papyri give instances of it. Ishmaelites postponed it till the thirteenth year (Gen. 17:25). He was also "of the stock of Israel."³ He was not a proselyte (Vincent), but belonged to the original stock of Jacob whose covenant name was Israel (Gen. 32:28). The Edomites were descended from Isaac through Esau and the Ishmaelites also from Abraham. Paul was a genuine Israelite in the covenant of grace (Rom. 9:4; 2 Cor. 11:22). Once more Paul was "of the tribe of Benjamin."¹ Benjamin was the son of Rachel, Jacob's beloved wife (Gen. 35:17 f.), and alone of the sons of Jacob was born in Palestine. The tribe of Benjamin gave the first king whose name (Saul) Paul also bore (1 Sam. 9:1 f.). This tribe also had the post of honour in battle. "After thee Benjamin" (Judg. 5:14). Mordecai was a Benjaminite. Benjamin alone remained faithful to Judah when the kingdom was divided (1 Kings 12:21). After the exile it was merged with Judah (Ezra 4:1). Paul was evidently proud of his descent from this little tribe (cf. Rom. 11:1; Acts 13:21). Paul was a true Benjaminite as a persecutor before his conversion: "In the morning he shall devour the prey and at night he shall divide the spoil" (Gen. 49:27). Paul was also "a Hebrew of the Hebrews."² By this phrase Paul means that he is a Hebrew sprung from Hebrews. The word Hebrew originally meant "passed over" in reference to Abram the Hebrew, as designated by foreigners. It was first used then to distinguish Abraham's descendants from other nations or peoples. They themselves preferred the term Israel or children of Israel. After the return from the exile "Jew"¹ came to be the common term in contrast with Greek (cf. Rom. 1 : 16), "we being Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles" (Gal. 2 : 15). Hebrew was now used chiefly for the language and customs of the Jews rather than for the race. It served to distinguish between two kinds of Jews. Those that spoke only the Greek language and followed some of the Greek customs were termed Hellenists,² while those who spoke Aramaic (Hebrew as in Acts 21 : 40 ; 22 : 2) were called Hebrews. This distinction is drawn in Acts 6 : 1 between the Hebrew and Hellenistic widows, both classes being Jewish Christians. Paul lived in Tarsus, a great Greek city of Cilicia, and spoke Greek, but he also spoke Aramaic and was loyal to the Hebrew traditions of the fathers. He comes of the Aramæan line, not the Hellenistic. He belonged to the purest and most loyal type of Jews, the Hebrews. He was both Hellenist and Hebrew.

¹ εἴ τις. δοκεῖ ἄλλος πεποιθέναι ἐν σαρκί, ἐγὼ μᾶλλον. Condition of the first class, determined as fulfilled. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 1007 ff. Cf. μὴ δόξητε in Matt. 3:9.

² περιτομῇ ὀκταήμερος. For the locative with adjectives see Robertson, "Grammar," p. 523. For this use of the temporal adjective like τεταρταῖος (John 11:39) see Robertson, "Grammar," p. 657.

³ ἐκ γένους Ἰσραήλ. The use of ἐκ for class or country is common (cf. John 3:1). Ἰσραήλ is appositive genitive. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 498.

¹ φυλῆς Βενιαμείν.

² Ἑβραῖος ἐξ Ἑβραίων.

But this is not all. In his own personal characteristics the same fidelity is found, "as touching the law, a Pharisee."³ Besides the inherited privileges he made his choice along the same line. He was in truth the son of a Pharisee (Acts 23 : 6). But he was a loyal and zealous Pharisee as opposed to the Sadducees. He was a diligent student of Pharisaism (Gal. 1 : 14) at the feet of Gamaliel in Jerusalem

¹ Ἰουδαῖος—Ἕλλην.

² Ἑλληνιστής.

³ κατὰ νόμον Φαρισαῖος. Cf. Acts 22 : 3 ; 23 : 6 ; 26 : 5.

(Acts 22 : 3) and he lived a Pharisee "after the strictest sect of our religion" (Acts 26 : 5). Indeed, in some points Paul was always a Pharisee (Acts 23 : 6). They were not wrong in everything (cf. Matt. 23 : 3). Paul undoubtedly received a deep impress from the school of Hillel and he always revered the law of Moses as the law of God (Rom. 7 : 12, 14, etc.). The Pharisees in reality struck down the law of God by their tradition (Mark 15 : 2, 3, 6). "As touching zeal, persecuting the church."¹ Vincent takes this language as ironical. "I was so very zealous that I became a persecutor of the church." Certainly the early Christians knew full well how true it was. One of the outgrowths of Pharisaism was the Zealot party which brought on the war with Rome and the destruction of Jerusalem. Paul calls himself a Pharisaic zealot in Galatians 1 : 14. The story in Acts 8 : 1 ff. amply justifies Paul's ironical claim. Once Paul did exactly what the Judaizers are now doing to Paul. "As touching the righteousness which is in the law blameless."² He means ceremonially blameless, of course, for that was righteousness to the Pharisee. This doing of righteousness was denounced by Jesus in Matthew 6 : 1-18 as punctilious performance of outward rules "to be seen of men" (cf. also Matt. 23 : 5). This righteousness was tested by the stand-ard¹ of the law (cf. Ps. Sol. 9:9). Jewish thought gave unusual prominence to righteousness.² In Romans 7 Paul describes his own fruitless efforts to satisfy his own conscience when once disturbed out of its complacent attitude. The rich young ruler (Mark 10:17-22) shows the self-satisfaction of the average Jewish moralist whose religion consisted in doing ritual and legal requirements. He felt himself "blameless" though he loved self more than God.

¹ κατὰ ζήλος διώκων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. Note neuter form of ζήλος here.

² κατὰ δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐν νόμῳ γερόμενος ἄμεμπτος.

Paul has made out such a good case for himself that one may half-way believe that Paul regrets his charge or at least thinks it useless. But he is simply making good his claim of "I yet more" in verse 4. He is trying to shame, if possible, those who, though nominal Christians, still set up their own claims to religious aristocracy. It is quite possible to-day for Christians to have pride, forsooth, not in Christ, but in themselves, in their social prestige, in the church to which they belong, in their denomination, in the pastor, in the music, in the church architecture. Each denomination may develop a special kind of pride on a par with Paul's pride as a Pharisee. Certainly each denomination has developed a special type of piety and Christian life.

3. Change of Values (verses 7 f.).

This category of religious prerogatives which Paul has made in verses 5 and 6 once satisfied Paul's ideals. They were such things as ¹ "I used to count up with a miserly greed and reckon to my credit" (Lightfoot). Like a miser he took peculiar delight in the clink of each piece of gold. They were "gains," ² indeed, "profits" of race and religion and personal zeal, each item in the old credit side of the ledger once gave Paul peculiar zest as he counted them up to his own spiritual delectation. These items were, indeed, usually considered the greatest blessings of life. Sir W. Robertson Nicoll has discussed in The British Weekly (1913) the "Greatest Joys of Life" with his readers. They do not all agree, though most find joy in the spiritual values of life. It is a sum in profit and loss.

¹ κατὰ.

² Cf. Weber, "Lehren des Talmud," pp. 209 f.

Now Paul has undergone an intellectual and spiritual revolution. "Howbeit," ³ he says, in sharp contrast to the old standpoint, "what things were gains to me," "these have I counted loss for Christ." ⁴ His words are measured and deliberate. He has come to count and still counts (the present perfect tense, punctiliar-linear), but not as he used to count. Now he counts "for Christ's sake," the new factor in the situation, the new standard of values, the new reason

¹ ἄτινα almost = οἷα. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 727.

² κέρδη. The plural was usually used of money. Jebb, Soph. Antig., 1326.

³ ἀλλὰ a real adversative here. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 1186 f.

⁴ ταῦτα ἡγῆμαι διὰ τὸν χριστὸν ζημίαν.

for life. Because of Christ, who has thus stepped in between¹ Paul and his old ideals, Paul has reversed his entire outlook on life. He has changed the heading at the top of the ledger. He has erased "gains" (credit) and written "loss" (debit). They are minus in the sum of life and plus no more. This word loss ends the sentence with a dull thud, but Paul is not done with the subject.

He starts all over again with glowing eagerness and passion, dropping the tone of irony above. He piles up particles in the effort to express his vehement emotion on the subject. The "yea, verily, and" very imperfectly renders the Greek original² which is more precisely, "But indeed therefore at least and." So Paul repeats his verb in the present tense, "I do count"³ by the new standard of values, not merely the religious prerogatives named above, but "all things"⁴ literally and emphatically as "loss" "for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord."⁵ This is no momentary impulse, no spasmodic rhapsody on Paul's part. Here he takes his stand. This is his choice in life. Paul has weighed the whole world ("all things") beside Christ. He has come to the same conclusion that Jesus an-

¹ διὰ.

² ἀλλὰ μὲν οὖν γε καὶ. Ellicott notes that ἀλλὰ contrasts, μὲν confirms, οὖν epitomizes, γε intensifies, καὶ proceeds with addition.

³ ἵγχομαι.

⁴ πάντα.

⁵ διὰ τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου μου.

nounced as wisdom when He said : " For what shall a man be profited if he shall gain¹ the whole world, and forfeit² his life ? " (Matt. 16 : 26). " For what shall a man give in exchange³ for his soul ? " In spiritual barter what is the price of a soul ? Mr. John D. Rockefeller is credited with wealth to the amount of a billion dollars. But what is that by the side of his soul ? The Czar of Russia was said to be worth many billions of dollars with an incredible income. But what is that beside the worth of his soul ? And the Czar has had to abdicate his throne before the wrath of his people. The knowledge⁴ of Jesus, " the most excellent of the sciences," overtops⁵ all else, rising sheer above all else in life like the highest mountain peak, dwarfing all other knowledge and all of everything else on earth. Christ is king of the intellect as of the heart. No other knowledge is so exalting and so uplifting as that of Jesus the Lord of life. Christians ought to be the noblest of men with such a commanding intellectual atmosphere in Christ. Theology is still the queen of the sciences in subject and object of research.

Life is a mystery at best, full of change and sur-

¹ κερδήσῃ. Cf. κέρδη.

² ζημιωθῇ. Cf. ζημία.

³ ἀντάλλαγμα.

⁴ γνῶσις experimental knowledge.

⁵ τὸ ὑπερέχον. The articular participle here, like the articular adjective, used as a substantive. Cf. Robertson, " Grammar," pp. 1108 f. Cf. 1 Cor. 4 : 17 for τὸ ἐλαφρόν τῆς θλίψεως.

prises. Relative values in life change with the years. The child is happy with his Christmas toys. "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child; now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things" (1 Cor. 13:11). Paul is now a man in Christ Jesus who dominates the world of manhood for him, "Christ Jesus my Lord." For Christ's sake¹ Paul did suffer loss,² yea, the loss of "the all things,"³ the sum-total of his old life's values. His own family probably regarded him as a disgrace to Judaism. His Pharisaic confrères considered him a deserter from the cause. The Jews in general treated him as a renegade and a turn-coat. He had paid the price for Christ's sake. But it is worth the price. He has no regrets. "I do count (the third use of this verb) but refuse"⁴ beneath my feet, not as diadems for my head. These "pearls" Paul deliberately flings to the dogs, if not to the swine, as trash. It is sad to see the poor picking for treasures in the piles of refuse. Paul is not a madman in reckless disregard of all values. It is the greatest bargain of life. He does it "that I may gain Christ."⁵ The new "gain" is Christ. He lost the Jewish world to gain Christ the Lord of all.

¹ δι' ὅν.

² ἐζημιώθην. Aorist ind. Definite period of his conversion.

³ τὰ πάντα.
⁴ σκύβαλα. Cf. Sirach 27:4. Either from εἰς κύνas βάλλω I fling to the dogs or from σκῶρ dung.

⁵ ἵνα χριστὸν κερδήσω. Cf. κέρδη.

4. Gaining Christ (verses 9-11).

What is it to "gain Christ"? Paul gave up all to win more in Christ. Lightfoot¹ properly notes that "the earnest reiteration of St. Paul's language here expresses the earnestness of his desire." Paul knows the power of repetition on the mind. It is a pity that verse 9 begins right in the middle of a subordinate clause, separating two verbs² ("gain," "be found") used with the same final particle ("that"³). As a matter of fact the thought in verses 9-11 is simply the expansion of that in the last words of verse 8, "that I may gain Christ." To be sure, Paul had gained Christ at once when he surrendered his Jewish prerogatives as sources of gain and pride. But he had not exhausted the unsearchable riches in Christ (Eph. 3:8). All the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are in Christ who is the mystery of God (Col. 2:2 f.). There are riches untold still ahead of Paul which beckon him on. These he can only enjoy when he has appropriated them and has made them his own. These verses are so rich in ideas that they overlap and overflow.

"And be found in him."⁴ Dying is gaining⁵ Christ, Paul has already told us (1:21), gaining Christ

¹ Thus κέρδη, κερδήσω—ἡγημαι, ἡγοῦμαι, ἡγοῦμαι—ζημίαν, ζημίαν, ἐζημιώθη—διά, διά, διά—πάντα, τὰ πάντα—γνώσεως, γινῶναι—Χριστὸν, Χριστοῦ, Χριστόν.

² κερδήσω, εὑρεθῶ.

³ ἵνα.

⁴ καὶ εὑρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ.

⁵ κέρδος.

in full, though life is Christ to Paul. Paul is already "in Christ" in the real mystic union. But Christ had new riches for Paul each day. The word "be found" has a semitechnical sense of "turn out actually to be" (Kennedy) as in Galatians 2:17 ("we ourselves also were found sinners" ¹). This complete identification of the believer with Christ is "the central fact in Paul's religious life and thought" (Kennedy). He probably here is thinking of the consummation when we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10). Then in reality Paul wishes it to be manifest to all that he is in Christ. When death overtakes Paul he wishes to be found by death in Christ. James Moffatt (Expository Times, October, 1912, p. 46) cites Epictetus² as using "found" of death: "I want to be found in right thoughts of God." It is a not uncommon thought with people as to what they should like to be doing when death finds them. Preachers are sometimes stricken with death in the pulpit. Paul's desire is that all shall know that then he is actually in Christ. In particular he is clear that then he will not have³ a righteousness of his own,⁴ that which is of the law,⁵ the sort that he once gloried in, the Pharisaic righteousness of rules and ceremonial

¹ εὐρέθημεν καὶ αὐτοὶ ἁμαρτωλοί.

² εὐρεθῆναι. Cf. also Epictetus 4:10-12. Cf. Gen. 5:24 καὶ οὐχ ἠύρισκετε διότι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεός.

³ μὴ ἔχων.

⁴ ἐμὴν, δικαιοσύνην.

⁵ τὴν ἐκ νόμου.

punctilios, "but that which is through faith in Christ,"¹ in a word, "the righteousness which is from God by faith,"² upon the basis³ of faith and issuing from⁴ God, the God-kind of righteousness (Rom. 1:17), the only real righteousness in Gentile or Jew (Rom. 1:18-3:20). Thus alone can one gain a right relation (righteousness) with God. It is not found outside of Christ. Only thus is God's standard met. This is God's gracious way of treating those as righteous who have no righteousness of their own. We may call it "forensic" if we wish, but that description in no way nullifies the fact. It is also ethical, for only thus is it possible for us to become righteous ourselves. God's love and forgiveness start us on a new plane and guide us in the new path. It is not a bald legal transaction, but "forgiveness with the Forgiver in it" (Rainy, Exp. Bible on Phil., p. 231). "The only way of entering on new relations with God, or ourselves becoming new men, is the way of faith" (Rainy, p. 233).

✠ Paul repeats the passion of his soul, "that I may know him,"⁵ that I may come to know him by

¹ ἀλλὰ τὴν διὰ πίστεως Χριστοῦ. Note the article here which is almost demonstrative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 780. The genitive Χριστοῦ is objective. Cf. ibid., pp. 499 ff.

² τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει.

³ ἐπὶ. The medium is expressed by διὰ.

⁴ ἐκ.

⁵ τοῦ γινῶναι αὐτόν. The infinitive of purpose (with τοῦ) is common enough. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1088.

richer experience.¹ He takes up the word "knowledge" from verse 8 and presses the idea home. Paul longs to "go in deeper" and to learn more of Christ by inner experience. He explains this knowledge as the natural result of winning Christ and being found in Him. "For with Paul this Christian Gnosis is the highest reach of Christian experience" (Kennedy). Paul takes up some of the items in the higher knowledge of Christ. "The power of his resurrection."² Paul is here thinking not of the historical fact of Christ's resurrection nor of his own resurrection after death. It is rather Paul's experimental knowledge of the power or force in Christ's resurrection in its influence on Paul's own inner life (Vincent). Cf. Romans 6: 4-11; Colossians 3: 1 ff. Lightfoot notes various aspects of this power as the assurance of immortality (Rom. 8: 11; 1 Cor. 15: 14 f.), as the triumph over sin and the pledge of justification (Rom. 4: 24 f.), as showing the dignity of the human body (1 Cor. 6: 13-15; Phil. 3: 21), as stimulating the whole moral and spiritual being (Rom. 6: 4; Gal. 2: 20; Col. 2: 12; Eph. 2: 5).³ There is the dynamic of the Cross because of the Resurrection of Jesus. Paul felt the grip of this truth in its appeal to holy living. He adds "the fellowship of his sufferings."¹ It is "participation" in the sufferings of Christ. Certainly Paul is here revealing "the deepest secrets" (Kennedy) of his own Christian experience. "Being in Christ involves fellowship with Christ at all points—His obedient life, His spirit, His sufferings, His death, and His glory" (Vincent). Paul is not thinking of martyrdom for himself, but of the "spiritual process which is carried on in the soul of him who is united to Christ" (Kennedy). As Paul understands the power of Christ's death and resurrection, he is able to understand His sufferings and to enter into them with sympathy and spiritual blessing as we drink from the cup that Christ drank (2 Cor. 4: 10; 1 Pet. 4: 13). The climax is reached by Paul in the words "becoming conformed unto his death."² One thinks at once of Romans 6: 3 "baptized into his death" and 5 "united with him in the likeness of his death" and then also Galatians 2: 20: "I have been crucified with Christ." We are in Paul's Holy of Holies in his relations with Christ. He suffers when Christ suffers. He dies when Christ dies. He lives when Christ lives. The language is symbolic, to be sure, but represents the deepest and highest things in life for Paul. This likeness to Christ is our destiny (Rom. 8: 29), but the process begins here. If we are to share in the glory of Jesus, we must also share in the suffering (Rom. 8: 17 f., 28 f.). So Paul rejoices to fill up on his part the sufferings of Christ left over for him (Col. 1: 24). In dying on the Cross Christ was regarded as sin (2 Cor. 5: 21) and identified Himself with the sin of the world. So now we are identified with Christ's sufferings and death.

¹ γινώσκω is common in this sense. Cf. 1 Cor. 13: 12. Cf. Eph. 1: 17-20; John 17: 3.

² τὴν δύναμιν τῆς ἀναστάσεως αὐτοῦ. Cf. our dynamite.

³ Cf. Westcott's "Gospel of the Resurrection," ii. § 31 f. Cf. Ellicott, in loco.

¹ κοινωνίαν παθημάτων αὐτοῦ.

² συμμορφιζόμενος τῷ θανάτῳ αὐτοῦ. Cf. σύμμορφος in Rom. 8: 29.

Paul closes with the modest hope, not at all in doubt, expressed in conditional form, "if by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead."¹ Paul does not here deny the general resurrection of the dead which he teaches in 1 Corinthians 15: 42. He is apparently here thinking only of the glorious resurrection of the pious dead and expresses the devout hope of sharing in that without throwing doubt at all upon his confidence in the matter. At any rate this passage makes it perfectly clear that Paul had no positive conviction that Jesus would come for him while alive before death. His language in 1 Thessalonians 4: 15 "we that are alive" does not mean that. He simply groups himself with the living for he is alive when he writes (cf. 1 Thess. 5 : 2 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 2). He hoped that Christ would come soon, but he has nowhere said that He would do so.

¹ εἴ πως καταντήσω εἰς τὴν ἐξανάστησιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν. The verb καταντήσω may be either future ind. or aorist subj. The use of εἴπως expresses a half purpose also. The use of ἐξανάστησιν rather than ἀνάστησιν has not been explained. Lightfoot takes it to be because of ἐκ with νεκρῶν and to emphasize the resurrection of the righteous out from the dead. Ellicott takes it to be the first resurrection as in Rev. 20: 5, and so interprets 1 Thess. 4: 16 where, however, the contrast is between Christians living and dead. The point is not made out (Vincent).

5. The Single Chase (verses 12-14).

Paul does not lose the sense of proportion in the midst of his rhapsody. He is keenly conscious of a possible misunderstanding of his language. He seems to be thinking of "some at Philippi who were claiming high sanctity and so affecting superior airs towards their brethren" (Kennedy) with inevitable irritations and jealousies. The reaction from Jewish formalism easily went from liberty to license. It was not a mere rhetorical question that Paul raised when he said : " Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound ? " (Rom. 6 : 1). The antinomian spirit was a live thing then and now. One wing of the Gnostics boldly argued that they were free from guilt in sins of the body so long as the spirit communed with the Lord. The so-called Christian Scientists to-day deny the reality of and guilt for sin. Some evolutionists treat sin not as a moral problem at all, but simply as an animal inheritance, " nature red in tooth and claw," not yet shaken off. Professional perfectionists likewise to-day minimize their own faults with all the skill of the Pharisees who " say and do not " (Matt. 23 : 3). So Paul says pointedly : " Not that I have already obtained, or am already perfect.”¹ Paul thus disclaims absolute perfection in unequivocal language. He gathers up in the verb “obtained”² or “attained” all his experiences and achievements thus far,³ all that he has described in verses 8–11. He then explains more literally his figure by the simpler “or am already made perfect.” The change of tense⁴ is not accidental or a confusion of tenses. He means to express his present state of imperfection. Absolute perfection he expressly denies. By the present perfect tense he gathers up the whole past in its relation to the present. He has not yet reached the goal. He is here discussing moral and spiritual perfection in Christ. There is a relative perfection which was true of Paul and of all who grow in grace at all and are no longer babes in Christ (cf. 3:15). Paul is not speaking of that. This holy dissatisfaction with his spiritual attainments and eager longing for loftier heights in Christ we often see in Paul’s writings (cf. Eph. 3:17–19; 4:13–16; Col. 1:28). Ignatius (Eph. iii) says: “I do not command you as though I were some-

¹ οὐχ ὅτι ἤδη ἔλαβον ἢ ἤδη τετελείωμαι. In New Testament οὐχ ὅτι is used to prevent misunderstanding, not as in classic Greek = not only, but. τετελείω is as common in Hebrews and means to bring to an end.

² ἔλαβον. Constative aorist. Cf. Robertson, “Grammar,” pp. 831–834. Cf. John 17:4 ἐδόξασα.

³ ἤδη.

⁴ τετελείωμαι. Present perfect. This tense is kept distinct from the aorist in the New Testament. Cf. Robertson, “Grammar,” pp. 898–902.

what, for even though I am in bonds for the Name's sake, I am not yet perfected in Christ."¹

"But I press on."² The verb is used of the chase and of the race. Ellicott renders it: "But I am pressing onwards." The verb means literally "I pursue" or "I follow after" (A. V.). "The pursuit is no groping after something undefined, nor is it prosecuted with any feeling of doubt as to the attainment of its end" (Vincent). It is the eager pursuit of a definite goal.³ Not every pursuit wins its object, but Paul is not doubtful about the outcome of this chase or race. "I press on," Paul says, "if so be that I may lay hold on that for which also I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus."⁴ This is his definite object. This is his real goal. He points to his conversion as the event in his life which explains everything. That is the moving power in Paul's growth.

¹ οὐ διατάσσομαι ὑμῖν, ὥς ὢν τι εἰ γὰρ καὶ δέδεμαι ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι, οὐπω ἀπὴρτισμαι ἐν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ.

² διώκω δέ. Paul is fond of διώκω (cf. Rom. 9:30 f.; 12:13; 14:19; 1 Cor. 14:1; 1 Thess. 5:15). A patricide fled into the desert and was pursued by a lion ἐδιόκειτο (ἐδιώκετο) ὑπὸ λέωντος. P. Grenf. II, 847 (cf. Moulton & Milligan, "Vocabulary," for other exx.).

³ Lucian (Hermot., 77) has ὁκύτεροι παραπολὺ διώκοντες οὐ κατέλαβον. Cf. Ex. 15:9. In Rom. 9:30 both verbs occur together. Cf. 1 Cor. 9:24; Eccl. 11:10.

⁴ εἰ καὶ καταλάβω, ἐφ' ᾧ καὶ κατελήμφθην ὑπὸ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ. Note the subjunctive here with εἰ (without ἄν), the deliberative subj., a sort of indirect question also, and a sort of correction to εἴ πως above (Kennedy). Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 934, 1017, 1044.

Christ changed him from persecutor to apostle. His goal now is to fulfill the ideal that Christ had for him in doing that (Vincent). "He desires to grasp that for which he was grasped by Christ" (ibid.). He has come far since that day on the Damascus road when Jesus stopped his course and turned him right about. The goal is still ahead, but Paul breathlessly follows after. The word "grasp"¹ is a strong word and is the one used of Christ's grasping Paul. He means to seize and hold.² Christ holds Paul fast and will not let him go. Hence Paul has confidence in the success of his own pursuit of this goal. Christ leads him on, ever beckoning as the fleeing goal moves on ahead, but never so far ahead as to make Paul lose heart and give up the chase. He is not chasing a bag of gold at the end of a rainbow or a will-o'-the-wisp in the bog. He is pressing on as Christ leads him on and up towards full manhood in Christ Jesus.

Once more Paul pauses to explain that he has not reached the top of this mountain. "Brethren, I count not myself yet to have laid hold."³ Success is certain, but still ahead of him. This is the third time he uses this word "lay hold" and he employs it here in the perfect tense. He disclaims the state of completion of his holy quest. The chase is not over. He has no delusions about that. "I do not count myself" at the end of the course. Later Paul did feel that way (1 Tim. 4:7 f.) when he faces death. Not yet has he grasped this flying goal. But does he stop? Not he. Does he change his interest to something else? Not Paul. "But one thing."¹ There is power in concentration. The mark of an educated man is just this power of concentration. The one thing worth while for Paul is to win the ideal set up for him by Christ, to grasp that goal. He will not be diverted to anything else. He will not be a quitter. He will not run off on side-issues like a dog that jumps every trail and holds to none, starting with a deer and ending the day barking at a rat hole. He has no time for lesser interests. He has "the expulsive power of a new affection" that drives out all else. Paul vividly pictures his tension in the chase, "forgetting the things which are behind."² He is not here thinking of his surrendered Jewish prerogatives, but of that part of the Christian-course already run (Ellicott). The precise phrase is used of the pre-Christian life as in Luke 9:62; John 6:66, but it does not follow that Paul so employs it here. The point is not that Paul is ashamed of his past career as a Christian, but simply that he does not lull himself to ease and relaxation of effort because of past achievements. These attainments are not to serve as a spiritual soporific, but as a stimulus to greater endeavour (cf. 1 Cor. 4:11-16; 9:19-27; 2 Cor. 11:23-12:6). Paul runs on "stretching forward to the things which are before."¹ He has no time to look backward. The rather he reaches out with a runner's eagerness, leaning forward to grasp the goal with the forward pressing of his body. It is the graphic word from the arena. The metaphor applies naturally to the tension of the runner in the foot race as he leans forward in his eagerness. "The eye outstrips and draws onward the hand, and the hand the foot" (Bengel). In sporting language he is on "the home-stretch." Lightfoot notes that not looking is fatal in the chariot race. Kennedy quotes Jeremiah 7:24 of the stubborn disobedience of those who "went backward and not forward."² Lucian³ describes "the good runner as only aiming at what is before and concentrating his attention on the goal."

¹ καταλάβω. Milligan ("Greek Papyri," p. 5) quotes Ex. Vol. Hercul. 1766 (iii. B. C.) καὶ ἐκεῖ κατεῖληφάμεν in sense of "finding" a friend.

² Note perfective use of κατα— The ἐφ' ᾧ either means τοῦτο ἐφ' ᾧ that with a view to which or ἐπὶ τούτῳ ὅτι for this reason that either makes good sense without much difference.

³ ἀδελφοί, ἐγὼ ἐμναυτὸν οὕτω λογίζομαι κατεῖληφέναι. The word λογίζομαι (common in Paul's Epistles) counts up calmly the results of a process of reasoning. Cf. our "reckon."

¹ ἔν δέ. Ellipsis and a common one. Can supply ποιῶ or any one of a number of verbs. Power in the ellipsis. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 391.

² τὰ μὲν ὀπίσω ἐπιλανθάνομενος. Both gen. and acc. occur with this verb. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 509. Acc. very common in the κοινή.

¹ τοῖς δὲ ἔμπροσθεν ἐπεκτεινόμενος. Note dative case. Cf. Vulgate extendens meipsum.

² ἐγενήθησαν εἰς τὰ ὀπίσθεν καὶ οὐκ εἰς τὰ ἔμπροσθεν.

³ Calumn. 12 πᾶσι γὰρ ὁ μὲν ἀγαθὸς δρομεὺς—μόνον τοῦ πρῶτω ἐφίεμενος καὶ τὴν διάνοιαν ἀποτείνας πρὸς τὸ τέλος.

Once more Paul gathers up his feelings on this great subject in a succinct repetition of the whole discussion: "I press on towards the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." "I press on towards the goal,"¹ he says. I rush on bearing down upon the mark set before me, keeping my eye fixed on that and not turning aside to look at anything else. "He who pursues sees nothing but that towards which he is hastening, and passes by all things, the dearest and the most necessary" (Theophylact, in loco). He presses on "unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." The prize belongs to the calling. Paul uses the same word for prize² in 1 Corinthians 9:24, "know ye not that they that run in a race run all, but one obtaineth the prize? Even so run, that ye may attain." Paul is thinking of the crown of righteousness (2 Tim. 2:10 f.; 4:8), not the garland of leaves for the victor in the games. He calls this "the upward calling."³ Paul speaks of "the hope of the calling" (Eph. 1:18; 4:4) and in Hebrews 3:1 we have "the heavenly calling." It is still the act¹ of calling. God is calling and beckoning us on and up towards Himself (cf. Eph. 1:18). It is God's calling in Christ Jesus (Heb. 12:1 f.). Chrysostom (in loco) says the specially honoured among the athletes were not crowned "below in the stadium,"² "but the king calling them up crowns them there."³ That crown is laid up for all who run the race with patience and love Christ's appearing (2 Tim. 4:8). I have seen the English skylark leap up from the meadow and have heard him sing his glorious way upward out of sight into the empyrean.

¹ κατὰ σκοπὸν διώκω. Cf. σκοποῦντες in Phil. 2:4 and ἀφορῶντες in Heb. 12:2. Σκοπός was used for the archer's mark (Job 16:13; Lam. 3:12). Cf. κατασκόπους for spies or scouts (Heb. 11:31) and κατασκοπεῖν for spying out (Gal. 2:4).

² τὸ βραβεῖον. The technical word is ἄθλον, but βραβεῖον is used of umpire in Col. 2:18; 3:15. But βραβεῖον in sense of "prize" occurs in Vettius Valens 174²¹, 288⁸ and in Priene Inscriptions 118⁸ (II B. C.). Cf. Moulton & Milligan, "Vocabulary."

³ τῆς ἀνω κλήσεως. Cf. John 11:41; Heb. 12:15.

¹ κλησις.

² ἐν τῷ σταδίῳ κάτω.

³ ἀλλ' ἄνω καλέσας ὁ βασιλεὺς ἐκεῖ στεφανοῖ.

IX

FOLLOWING THE ROAD

(3: 15-21)

THE skylark comes down to earth again. Jesus brought Peter, James, and John down from the Mount of Transfiguration to the valley of sorrow and struggle where there was work to do. Even the aeroplane has to come back to earth to replenish its supplies. Paul does not work a figure to death. He still has in mind the question of Christian perfection which he discusses with less passion, but with equal force. His very calmness after the whirl of words adds vigour to the ending. The Holy Quest has its monotonous moments when one is tempted to give it up or is in danger of losing his way. Mysticism is in peril of becoming only a mist or fog.

1. Getting the Right Point of View (verse 15).

"Let us therefore, as many as are perfect, be thus minded."¹ This simple sentence fairly bristles with difficulties. It "shows the effect of the strong emotion which pervades the preceding passage" (Vincent). Paul had just categorically and repeatedly denied the attainment of "perfection" in his own case (verses 12 f.). And yet here he includes himself among the "perfect" in "let us be thus minded." Evidently it is not a matter of courtesy simply, but of sincerity. It does "seem strange" (Rainy, in loco). Besides, the very form of the expression "as many as are perfect" implies that some are perfect and some are not. But the explanation is not far to seek and one in harmony with Paul's disclaimer of absolute perfection above. The Greek word for "perfect" is here used in the sense of relative perfection, as is common in the New Testament, contrasting the mature Christians with the babes in Christ who lack the experience and development which others have obtained. By this word "grown men" in Christ are described as in 1 Corinthians 14:20 where "children" and "men" are contrasted¹ by the word "perfect" for "men." In Ephesians 4:13 we have the phrase "unto a full-grown man"² with the same word for "perfect." So in Hebrews 5:13 the writer contrasts "babes"³ in Christ and "full-grown men"⁴ who can stand strong meat. Once more in 1 Corinthians 13:10 f. Paul uses "the perfect" for absolute perfection and illustrates it by the other sense of relative perfection, the contrast between child and man. The case is made out therefore and the idiom is in accord with Paul's other descriptions of the

¹ "Ὅσοι οὖν τέλει, τοῦτο φρονῶμεν.

¹ παιδία—τέλειοι.

³ νήπιος.

² εἰς ἄνδρα τέλειον.

⁴ τελείων.

relatively advanced Christians, "the spiritual" (Gal. 6: 1), "the strong" (Rom. 15: 1). The absolute use of perfect is further seen in Matthew 5: 48; James 1: 4; 3: 2. It is the desire of Paul to present every man "perfect in Christ" (Col. 1: 28) at last. It is here the ideal not yet realized in the full sense, though there is a sense in which it is relatively true of all those who have been initiated into the mystery of Christ and have made progress in the knowledge of Christ. It is not necessary to insist that Paul is using the word "perfect" in the sense of the "mysteries" (cf. Kennedy, "St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions"), though it is quite possible that his use of the term is suggested by that common terminology. There is at any rate a touch of irony in Paul's employment of "perfect" in the double sense (absolute in verse 12, relative in verse 15). Those, like himself, who claim relative perfection, he exhorts to think¹ "this." What is "this" or "thus minded"? It is what he has just been saying in the preceding verses, viz.: that they have not yet attained to absolute perfection. The "full-grown men" in Christ are the very ones who are tempted to think that they have reached the goal of absolute perfection. There were probably some of them in Philippi who needed this delicate hint not to be satisfied with their present attainments in grace and goodness, who need the lesson of humility that Paul has enforced by the example of Christ and now by Paul's own attitude of mind. Spiritual pride is very subtle and creeps into the hearts of the most gifted saints if they are not on the watch. Paul does not wish his readers to think that they have already reached the goal because in one sense they belong to the ranks of the mature. It is almost a pity that we have "perfect" as the translation in verse 15. Cf. 1 Corinthians 14:20 where it is "men."

¹ ἑρπονῶμεν. Hortatory subjunctive. Linear action.

"And if in anything ye are otherwise minded,"¹ Paul goes on. He assumes that the Philippians will agree with him in his general statement on the subject of Christian perfection. He adds, however, a possible detail as exception. If you think otherwise on any particular point that Paul has not mentioned and so claim absolute perfection on that, then what? Well, then, "this also shall God reveal unto you."² If they have followed Paul thus far, there is hope for the rest of the way, even if it takes time. Paul trusts God to "unveil" the particular problem, untie that knot, unravel that mystery as He has done the rest. Paul has patience with the merely inept and surely we need it. Sanity on the subject of Christian perfection is sorely needed when we have one extreme of antinomian license and the other of professional perfectionism. A story is told by Spurgeon that one

¹ καὶ εἴ τι ἑτέρως φρονεῖτε.

² καὶ τοῦτο ὁ θεὸς ὑμῖν ἀποκαλύψει. It could be rendered "even this."

Sunday morning a crank stepped into his study with the remark that the Lord had revealed to him that he was to preach for Spurgeon that morning. Quick as a flash Spurgeon replied that he had just received a later revelation to show him the door, which he did.

The point of this often misunderstood verse is, therefore, that we must get and keep the right standpoint. We must read the sign-board aright and take the right turn of the road. We must not lose our way in a bog of self-satisfaction and smug complacency or of cold indifference. We must keep up the struggle. We may stick a peg here and there as we go provided we do not stop with the peg. We must go on. That is the main thing.

2. Keeping On in the Path (verse 16).

Here we have an echo of "one thing I do" in verse 14. Paul is not impatient of minor differences of opinion (verse 15) which are more or less inevitable in men, provided the Philippians will stick to the main road and go ahead. "Only, whereunto we have attained let us keep on in the same path."¹ The word for "only"² is common in introducing a parenthesis (Kennedy) or at the end of an argument to single out the main point.³ "Just one thing more." In opposing the claim of absolute perfection Paul wishes no misunderstanding. They must not give up the struggle in despair any more than they must stop because they think that they have already reached the end in view. Either were mockery. Weizsäcker hits it off correctly: "Only one thing. So far as we have come, keep the path." The translation "by the same rule" misses the point. We have come thus far on the way to the goal which is still ahead. What are we to do? There is but one thing to do, just go right on in the same path by which we have come¹ thus far. The word for "walk"² means to "walk in file," to "keep the step." This is hard to do. It is climbing a sandy mountain often. We slip back almost as much as we go on and up. The notion of row³ or alphabet appears in Galatians 4:3, 9. The tramp, tramp of the soldier is fine for a while, but in time one is weary and it is hard not to lag behind. One comes to the jog-trot of the Christian life. The dull monotony of religious routine palls on one. But there is but one thing to do and that is to keep on going¹ in the same path.² This is the way the dog went to Dover, leg over leg, step by step. "It's dogging as does it." There is monotony in work, the tedium of household cares, the grind of church services, the petty details of pastoral life, the minutiae of scholarship and all forms of Bible study, the treadmill of spiritual exercises (prayer, reading the Scriptures, singing, church attendance, work for Christ), the humdrum of things like three meals a day and going to bed every night—these things tend to pall on the sensitive spirit. But we shall die if we do not eat, sleep, walk, work, breathe. We shall die without the common details in the spiritual life. The lesson for our time is precisely this, to keep at it. I love to hear a boy whistle at his work or play. He loves then to keep at it. Thus we can put new spirit into the same old tasks, the same old church, the same old preacher. Victory lies along the path by which we have come. We must not merely "think" right (verse 15). We must also keep up the practice and keep on in the same path that leads to the goal. Let us not forget that. Fidgetiness is not spiritual activity. We are not to be restless spiritual "hobos," always on the jump and never getting on. It is the steady tread in the right path with the eye fixed on Christ that tells the story of final achievement.

¹ πλὴν εἰς ὃ ἐφθάσαμεν, τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν.

² πλὴν. Probably from πλέων more.

³ Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1187.

¹ ἐφθάσαμεν is a dramatic aorist for present attainment. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 841-843. This verb originally meant to arrive "before" some one else (as in 1 Thess. 4:15), but here it has lost all idea of anticipation and means simply "come" as in 2 Cor. 10:14. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 551.

² στοιχεῖν. For infinitive as imperative see Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 943 f. Cf. χαίρειν in James 1:1 and in the papyri. Kennedy notes that "to work" in English may be originally dative case, then exclamatory imperative, and then infinitive like the Greek absolute infinitive here.

³ Cf. συστοιχεῖ in Gal. 4:25. The verb στοιχεῖν occurs in Syll. 325⁶ (ii. B. C.) in sense of walking in the steps of one's fathers (Moulton & Milligan, "Lexical Notes from the Papyri," Expositor, June, 1911).

¹ στοιχεῖν is linear action (pres. inf.).

² τῷ αὐτῷ locative case.

3. Keeping the Eye On the Guide (verse 17).

Paul had urged that they keep step¹ in the Christian walk. He carries that idea further in his charge: "Brethren, be ye imitators together of me."² Lightfoot puts it better thus: "Vie with each other in imitating me." In 1 Corinthians 11:1 Paul says: "Be ye imitators of me, even as I also am of Christ." That is precisely the point. "Paul is compelled to make his own example a norm of the new life" (Kennedy). Paul knows wherein he imitates Christ who is the real standard of orthodoxy and orthopraxy (cf. 2 John 9). But Jesus is no longer visible in the flesh and people need an objective standard, a secondary standard. We copy the copy of the original in most cases. The preacher cannot escape this side of his responsibility if he would. He must show the way by his walk as well as by his talk. Paul made his own living in Thessalonica "to make ourselves an ensample³ unto you, that ye should imitate us" (2 Thess. 3:9). He did it for that purpose. Besides, says Paul, ye "yourselves know how ye ought to imitate us" (2 Thess. 3:7). Paul begs the Corinthians to imitate him (1 Cor. 4:16). The pastor must lead and the people are to follow. Paul wishes not merely sporadic following, but "a whole company" of imitators¹ (Ellicott). There is no self-conceit in Paul's demand that they all follow him. It is like the Captain who says: "Follow me." Imitation plays a large part in all life. Most that the child learns at home is unconscious imitation. The preacher is an object lesson to the church. Like priest like people. Children copy the preacher and the church members copy his shortcomings and often criticize his virtues.

¹ στοιχεῖν.

² συνημιμηταί μου γίνεσθε, ἀδελφοί. The word μιμητής is our mimic.

³ τύπον.

"And mark them that so walk."² Paul is not the only one who follows Christ. There were many in Philippi who did so. Keep your eye on those who keep to the same path by which you have come. The word here for "mark"³ is sometimes used for watching and avoiding as in Romans 16:17: "Mark them that are causing the divisions and occasions of stumbling, contrary to the doctrine which ye learned; and turn away from them." But it may also be used for keeping the eye on good things as in 2 Corinthians 4:18 where it is employed for the spiritual vision of the unseen as the guide of life. It is dangerous to take the eye off of the guide in perilous mountain climbing or in tangled jungles. Once lost, one is helpless. Keep your eye on the goal if you can see it. If not, keep your eye on one who knows the way to the goal and who is going there. This is the only way to walk straight. Signs are useless if erased or doubtful. Many an accident is due to misreading of the signals by the engineer. It is still worse to follow false signs. Lights are used by wreckers to lure vessels on the breakers, false lights that point the way to death.

¹ συνμιμηταί. Co-imitores. Paul is fond of the preposition συν—in composition. Cf. συνπολιται in Eph. 2:19. Plato (Polit., p. 274D) has συνμιμείσθαι.

² καὶ σκοπεῖτε τοὺς οὕτως περιπατοῦντας. Cf. σκοπός goal.

³ σκοπεῖτε. Cf. "Mark Twain."

"Even as ye have us for an ensample."¹ Paul changes from "me" to "us" on purpose. Timothy and Epaphroditus were two certainly that we can name who besides Paul were ensamples to the Philipians. The word for "ensample"² was originally the impression left by a blow, the mark of the blow as in John 20:25 "the print of the nails." Then it was used of the thing that caused the mark as a type or mould or pattern (cf. our use of type in printing). Paul is fond of this word (cf. Rom. 5:14; 6:17; 1 Cor. 10:6, 11; 1 Thess. 1:7). There is the mould of doctrine (Rom. 6:17) and the mould of life as here. It is sad when a church is afraid to follow the preacher, still sadder when the church ought to refuse to follow his bad example, when he does not follow Christ. Blind guide he is then and those that follow him will fall with him into the pit.

4. Missing the Path (verses 18 f.).

"For many walk" evilly,³ Paul means, though he does not use the word. One is reminded of Psalm 1. Perhaps Paul is even thinking of walking hypocritically, for he is hardly referring to the heathen. He either has in mind the Judaizers, the "dogs" of verse 2, or lackadaisical Christians, nominal church members, who bring reproach on Christ by their conduct, antinomian libertines, incipient Gnostics, immoral men with Epicurean philosophy. Something can be said for both of these views, though probably the latter suits the context more exactly. Action and reaction follow each other. The lax age of Charles the Second followed the age of the Puritans under Cromwell. Perhaps both extremes were represented in the church of Philippi. At any rate they had been warned by Paul of one of these classes, "of whom I told you often."¹ Paul had done his duty to them either when with them or in letters which we do not now possess (cf. 3 : 1). "And now tell you even weeping."² Once more Paul repeats his warning and it brings tears to his eyes to have to use such plain language about professed followers of Christ. Paul was a man of great heart and his emotional nature is often profoundly stirred. It was so once when he had to write with severity to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 2 : 4). He admonished the Ephesians with tears many times (Acts 20 : 31). It is a serious situation in Philippi and it stirs Paul's heart to the bottom. He is cut to the quick over the disgrace in this noble church to the name of Christ. It is enough to break a preacher's heart to see so many Christians recreant and disloyal. They are "the enemies of the cross of Christ."¹ Both the Judaizers (Gal. 5:11; 6:12 f.) and the antinomian Gnostics (Col. 3:5 f.; cf. 2 Cor. 1:5 f.) were hostile to the cross of Christ as were the Jews and Greeks generally (1 Cor. 1:17 f.). But these persons took it as a personal affront and made themselves personal enemies of the cross of Christ which reflected on their lives of self-indulgence. Polycarp (Phil. 7) speaks of "whoever does not confess the witness of the cross." Rainy (Phil., p. 286) speaks of hangers-on who love "the suburban life of Zion," but who wish none of the limitations and responsibilities of the yoke of service.

¹ καθὼς ἔχετε τύπον ἡμῶν. ² τύπον. From τύπτω strike.

³ πολλοὶ γὰρ περιπατοῦσιν. Vg. ambulant.

¹ οὓς πολλάκις ἔλεγον ὑμῖν.

² νῦν δὲ καὶ κλαίων λέγω.

But Paul is pitiless in his picture of these men "whose end is destruction."² End with them is both consummation and culmination. It is more than mere termination (cf. Rom. 6:21; 2 Cor. 11:15). The word for destruction does not necessarily mean annihilation. It is rather a state of moral ruin. It is used of the lost though physically alive (cf. Luke 19:10). "Whose god is the belly,"³

¹ τοὺς ἐχθροὺς τοῦ σταυροῦ τοῦ χριστοῦ. The accusative here is in apposition to the relative οὗς (cf. 1 John 2:25) unless λέγω be taken as "call" (Kennedy) when it is predicate accus. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 416, 480.

² ὣν τὸ τέλος ἀπώλεια. Paul gives σωτηρία as the end of the redeemed and ἀπώλεια of the lost (1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15 f.).

³ ὥν ὁ θεὸς ἡ κοιλία. Vg. quorum Deus Venter est.

Paul adds. In Romans 16:18 we have: "For they that are such serve not our Lord Christ, but their own belly."¹ The comic poet Eupolis describes one as "a devotee of the belly,"² who makes a god of his belly. The glutton or gourmand is on the road to this low estate. Cicero tells it on himself that once at a feast he took an emetic that he might enjoy more of the dinner. Perhaps more people make a god of their stomachs than will admit it. We have a proverb to the effect that we dig our graves with our teeth. Paul says: "The Kingdom of God is not eating and drinking" (Rom. 14:17), a truism about sticklers for certain kinds of food, but equally true in this context. The word for belly is used for all sorts of sensual indulgence and applies to drink and immorality also (wine and women). Once more Paul says, "whose glory is in their shame."³ These moral perverts turn liberty into license. They throw moral pride to the winds and become unmoral degenerates. They revel in the mire and mud like the hog, and rejoice in their debasement. The life of the underworld is a terrible reality in all our large cities to-day, but Paul pictures some persons in the church at Philippi as in the grip of the same form of vice, which has mastered them and bound them hand and foot, slaves of sin. The last word that Paul has about these spiritual perverts is "who mind earthly things."¹ These are just the opposite of Paul in his passion for the upward calling (verse 14). They hear no call to fly like the eagle in the cage, but, like Bunyan's man with the muckrake, grovel in the dirt and glory in the drivel and dust of earth. They have their minds set on things of time and sense and on the lowest plane of things here below. What do modern people care most about? Face the facts. Statistics tell some things rightly. On any Sunday in our modern cities the moving picture-shows will be crowded when the churches are thinly attended. On a pretty Sunday in the summer the baseball park will be full. The horse races where still allowed have no lack of crowds. People complain of hard times, but have plenty of money for dress and for food and for travel. The public talk is much more about these things than about the Kingdom of God and righteousness upon earth. But there are "forward-looking men," to use President Woodrow Wilson's striking phrase, who do look up instead of down, onward instead of backward, inward instead of merely outward.

¹ Seneca has: Alius abdomini servit.

² κοιλιοδαίμων. In his Κόλακες Xenophon (Mem. 1:6, 8, etc.) has δουλεύειν γαστρί. Cf. 2 Pet. 2:13.

³ καὶ ἡ δόξα ἐν τῇ αἰσχύνῃ αὐτῶν. Cf. Prov. 26:11; Sirach 4:21. It was apparently a current proverb.

¹ οἱ τὰ ἐπίγεια φρονούντες. The use of the nominative here after οὗς and ὧν is not unknown. In fact such an independent nominative in apposition is a rather common anacoluthon. Cf. οἱ κατέσθοντες in Mark 12:40. So also Mark 7:19; Acts 10:37; Rev. 1:5; 7:4; 20:2. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 414 f.

5. A Colony of Heaven (verse 20^a).

"For our citizenship is in heaven."¹ This Paul says in contrast with those who "mind earthly things" (verse 19). The emphatic word is "our" in opposition to the mundane and grovelling spirit of the recreant Christians who make a god of the belly. In 1 : 27 Paul had urged the duty of worthy conduct as citizens.² The Vulgate here has conversatio (A. V. conversation) which properly rendered one aspect of the Greek word³ as manner of life. Our modern use of conversation for talk is simply one phase (possibly the main one in some cases) of conduct. But it probably here means the commonwealth or state as in 2 Macc. 12 : 7 ; Philo, de Jos. ii. p. 51 M and in the inscriptions. The Jews therefore had adopted this word from the Greeks a good while before Paul wrote (Kennedy).⁴ Jesus told Pilate that His kingdom was not of this world (John 18 : 36). The heavenly Jerusalem (or that which is above) appears in Galatians 4 : 26 and Mt. Zion is contrasted with Mt. Sinai in Hebrews 12 : 20 ff. The New Jerusalem is heaven in Revelation 21. The point with Paul here is that we are now citizens of heaven even while

¹ ἡμῶν γὰρ τὸ πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανοῖς ὑπάρχει. The Vulgate has autem, but enim is more exact for γὰρ.

² ἀξίως πολιτεύεσθε.

³ πολίτευμα. Used practically in same sense as πολιτεία by Aristotle. Cf. πολιτεία in Acts 22 : 28.

⁴ Cf. Hicks, "Political Terms in the New Testament" (Classical Review, i., 1, pp. 6-7).

living on earth. We are fellow-citizens¹ with the saints and the household of God (Eph. 2 : 19). Our life is hid with Christ in God (Col. 3 : 3). We like the patriarchs look for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God (Heb. 11 : 10), a better country, that is an heavenly (11 : 16), being "strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (11 : 13). In other words, our real citizenship is in the commonwealth of heaven, the Kingdom of God. We are a colony of heaven here on earth (Moffatt), a pattern of the heavenly for earthly citizens. Philippi was itself a colony of Rome and would understand perfectly² this local touch in Paul's figure. Paul himself was proud of his Roman citizenship and had found it an advantage in Philippi (Acts 16 : 37-39) and in Jerusalem (Acts 21 and 22). Paul is not speaking of an impossible Utopia or a vague ideal like Plato's Republic or even as impractical a thing as Augustine's City of God. Paul means that Christians must live now on earth as citizens of the heavenly commonwealth, not merely that we shall be heavenly citizens after death. The Christian commonwealth is a present reality in the world.³ It partly fulfills the prayer which Jesus taught the disciples to pray : " Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth " (Matt. 6 : 10). The full consummation is to come at the end, but Christianity is the most powerful factor in the life that now is. We are in the world, but not of its spirit. We live under the principles, ideals, and laws of heaven. We must apply them to the life in this world. In a word we are a patch of heaven on earth to help make earth like heaven. The roar of the guns in the World's Great War only accentuates the words of Paul. We must drive war out of this world and make men turn their swords into ploughshares. The war on war is long, but the Kingdom of God is coming, always coming in power, and is here in the hearts of those who feel themselves more citizens of heaven than of earth. The true patriotism is the hunger for and loyalty to the real Fatherland, for heaven is our home.

¹ συνπολιταί.

² They knew what the jus Italicum meant. Cf. Marquardt, "Römische Staatsverwaltung," Bd. I, pp. 363 ff.

³ In the Epistle to Diognetus we read of Christians this : ἐπὶ γῆς διατρίβουσιν ἀλλ' ἐν οὐρανῷ πολιτεύονται. Cf. Plato "Republic," 592.

6. Looking for the King (verse 20^b).

Meanwhile we all know that earth is not yet heaven. There are colonies of heaven scattered here and there over the world. These are the joy and hope of men. The attitude of these colonies of heaven is one of expectation. At best earth still has its sorrows. Our eyes turn heavenward " whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ."¹

¹ ἐξ οὗ καὶ σωτῆρα ἀπερδεχόμεθα, Κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν.
Here ἐξ οὗ is probably adverbial and refers to οὐρανοῖς.

The Lord Jesus Christ (note all three words) is the King in the heavenly commonwealth or kingdom. He is coming back to complete His glorious work. Meanwhile we wait for Him "as Saviour."¹ He is needed as Saviour and He will come. He will complete the work of salvation and rescue men from sufferings and infirmities of the flesh (Rom. 8:19 ff.; 2 Cor. 5:4). The inscriptions often speak of the Roman Emperor as God and Saviour in fulsome flattery. But Paul's word "wait for" or "tarry for"² reveals the note of eager expectancy as if a wife steps out of the door in the evening and looks away down the lane for the husband who is late in coming. The King is coming. The tiptoe of anticipation is like that of the crowds at Delhi during the Durbar who waited for the appearance of their king from England. Christians have Christ's own promise that He will come back. As a colony of heaven they have a right to look for Him. This blessed hope exerted a powerful influence for holy living and Christian activity among the early Christians. Some of them misunderstood the promise as definitely made for their own time. The centuries have dimmed for many the brightness of this star of hope, but without reason, for a day with the Lord is as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day (2 Pet. 3:8). The promise of the first coming of the Messiah seemed long in realization, but Christ did come in the fullness of time. Christ's own word is that we be ready: "Watch" (Matt. 25:13). This is the attitude of which Paul speaks. We are still watching and waiting for the King.

¹ Predicate accusative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 480. The word σωτήρ is common in 2 Peter and the Pastoral Epistles for God.

² ἀπεκδεχόμεθα (common with Paul as in Gal. 5:5; 1 Thess. 1:10; Rom. 8:19, 23, 25. Cf. Heb. 9:28; 1 Pet. 3:20). Cf. ἀποκαταδοκία in Phil. 1:20.

7. The Body of Glory (verse 21).

The King will come and will finish His work. He "will fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory."¹ Christ will "change the fashion" (cf. Rom. 12:2; 1 Cor. 4:6; 2 Cor. 11:13-15) of our body from corruption to incorruption (1 Cor. 15:44, 51). We shall be clothed upon (2 Cor. 5:4) with a spiritual body connected with this body which belongs to our state of humiliation (not "vile body") as seed-corn with harvest and yet not this same body of flesh and blood which cannot enter the Kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:50). It is all a mystery, but modern science by no means discredits the kind of a resurrection of the body which Paul pictures here and in 1 Corinthians 15. Paul does not consider the body in which our spirit dwells as itself evil and only vile as the Gnostics held. On the contrary Paul urged the dignity of the body as the abode of the redeemed soul (1 Cor. 6: 12-20) and the temple of God (1 Cor. 3: 16). Hence Paul urged that we must glorify God in the body (1 Cor. 6: 20). But though our bodies are subject to infirmity, weakness, disease and death, yet they have a glorious destiny as well as a high honour now. This body of our humiliation is to be "conformed"¹ to the body of Christ's glory. Our renewed (refashioned) body will be like in essential form that of Jesus. We shall be made fit for the family of God in heaven (cf. Rom. 8: 29 f.). We shall have on the wedding garment of glory. We shall have a spiritual body suitable for the new environment in heaven. Peter, James, and John saw the glory of Jesus on the majestic mount of transfiguration. The process of transformation of our spirits has already begun here and we are transformed from glory to glory (2 Cor. 3: 18). This word "glory" was used for the Shekinah. Jesus is the Glory (Jas. 2: 1) and we shall be like Him for we shall see Him as He is (1 John 3: 2). If one hesitates at the stupendous claim that Paul makes about the body he must recall the power at Christ's disposal, "according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things into himself,"² according to "the energy of his power." He not merely possesses inherent (latent) power, but He exercises ¹ this dynamic energy (Col. 1:29; 7:12; 2 Thess. 2:9) as Creator and Preserver of the Universe (Col. 1:16 f.). The glorious destiny of all things is to come fully under the sway of Christ's will. The Crowning Day is coming when God will sum up all things in Christ.

¹ ὅς μετασχηματίζει τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν σύμμορφον τῷ σώματι τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ. Vg. has corpus humilitatis.

¹ Predicate accusative. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 480. Cf. σύμμορφον here and μετασχηματίσει.

² κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν τοῦ δύνασθαι αὐτὸν καὶ ὑποτάξαι αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα.

¹ "The power or virtue which was in Christ when the woman touched the hem of his garment (Mark 5:30; Luke 8:46) was δύναμις. In the healing of the woman it became ἐνέργεια" (Vincent). In the New Testament ἐνέργεια is limited to superhuman activity (cf. Robinson, Eph., p. 242). Cf. περὶ τῆς ἐνεργείας θεοῦ Διὸς (OGIS 2624 iii. A. D.), Moulton & Milligan, "Lexical Notes from the Papyri," Expositor, March, 1909.

X

THE GARRISON OF PEACE

(4 : 1-9)

PEACE is one of the greatest of blessings. The peace that Christ gives is better than any "King's Peace" of the feudal times : "Peace I leave with you ; my peace I give unto you : not as the world giveth, give I unto you" (John 14 : 27). This peace of Christ cannot be taken from us by our environment or by earthly circumstance. And yet peace in itself is not the first blessing. "But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable" (Jas. 3 : 17). Righteousness, not peace, exalteth a nation. It is sometimes necessary to fight in order to have peace, a peace that rests on the triumph of right over wrong. The devil offered Jesus the copartnership of the world as a compromise on condition that Jesus recognize the devil's sovereignty and power. But Jesus chose war, eternal war, the path to the Cross. Thus He won the right and the power to bring peace to the sinner. Paul exhorted us all to live peaceably with all men, if possible, as far as it depends on us (Rom. 12 : 18). But we are not to be silent on great moral issues for the sake of a complacent peace with the powers of evil. Christ does not require us to make peace at any price. The rather He challenges to victorious conquest of the forces of evil. But we are to fight even evil in the spirit of Christ and with the weapons of righteousness and truth. A dead church can find no consolation in the peace of God.

1. Standing Fast (verse 1).

Paul applies his message about the heavenly citizenship (3:17-21) to the situation in Philippi. "Wherefore,"¹ he pleads, because you are citizens of heaven, have courage here on earth. "So stand fast in the Lord."² "So" stand as becomes citizens of heaven and as Paul has exhorted them. Paul has used the figures of running, of pursuing,³ of walking,⁴ and now he adds that of standing. It is often very hard to stand still. Attack is said to be much easier than defense. It is difficult to stand still and be shot at. In Ephesians 6:11, 13, 14 Paul repeats the command to "stand" as soldiers of Christ. When others run away, it is hard to stand one's ground. It is not easy to stand against the flood-tide. Paul makes a tender plea for stability. "My brethren beloved ¹ ὥστε. Common as inferential particle at beginning of sentence with no effect on structure of the sentence. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 999 f.

² οὕτως στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ. Paul uses ἐν κυρίῳ more than forty times and it occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, save in Rev. 14:13. The form στήκετε belongs to the colloquial κοινή, a present made on a perfect stem. Cf. Phil. 1:27.

³ διώκω.

⁴ στοιχέω.

and longed for.”¹ Here we see “a hint of the pain caused by his separation from them” (Vincent). “My joy and crown.”² They are now his joy and they will be his crown of victory in the day of Christ, showing that he did not labour in vain (Phil. 2 : 16). The word here used for crown is that for the chaplet of victory in the games, not the diadem³ worn by kings. Paul spoke of the Thessalonians as his hope, joy, crown (1 Thess. 2 : 19). He repeats his affectionate appeal after the exhortation to steadfastness by saying once more, “Beloved.” He is not ashamed to show his love for the saints. He is very much in earnest that the Philippians shall be loyal to Christ in this time of trial. His words are enough to melt a heart of stone and must have had a powerful effect on the church.

2. Helping These Women (verses 2 f.).

“I exhort Euodia, and I exhort Syntyche, to be of the same mind in the Lord.” Paul makes specific⁴ the general exhortation in 2 : 2. Clearly these two women were prominent in the church in Philippi and may have been deaconesses like Phœbe of Cenchreæ

¹ ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοὶ καὶ ἐπιπόθητοι. Vulgate has fratres mei carissimi, et desideratissimi. The Latin superlatives bring out the passion in the Greek adjectives.

² χαρὰ καὶ στέφανός μου. Vg. has gaudium meum et corona mea.

³ διάδημα (Rev. 12 : 3). The verb στεφανόω is used in the κοινή for obtaining reward (Deissmann, “Bible Studies,” p. 261).

⁴ τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν.

(Rom. 16 : 1). They have beautiful names. Euodia¹ means "Prosperous Journey" (or "Sweet Fragrance" if another text is followed) and Syntyche "Good Luck." He mentions the names with safety in public because he is in Rome and because the matter was probably now a topic of public talk though not advanced to open breach. Klöpper thinks that separate factions of the church were meeting in the homes of these two women as the church originally met in the home of Lydia (Acts 16 : 40). Women were prominent in the foundation of the church in Philippi (Acts 16 : 13 f.) and had special honour in this Roman colony (cf. Lightfoot, in loco) as in Rome itself (Rom. 16).² The activity of other Macedonian women in Paul's work is seen in Acts 17 : 4, 12. We do not know what the trouble was between these women. It may have been on the subject of perfection (cf. 3 : 13-16). It may have been the very question of woman's rights or it may have been a matter of personal taste. The cause may have been trivial enough, for slight bickerings are easily magnified into great issues by the hypersensitive. "It may have been accidental friction between two energetic Christian women" (Kennedy). A slight breeze would cause trouble in so noble a church. I know of a lovely woman who took umbrage because a dear friend refused to speak on meeting her in the street. But the guilty woman was near-sighted and did not see her friend! Paul is perfectly impartial in his exhortation and repeats the verb¹ with each name. Perhaps each was to blame in part. They can come together in the Lord at any rate. They expect to be one in Christ in heaven. They had best be so here and now.

¹ Εὐδοκία. Some MSS. read Εὐδοκίαν (cf. ὁσμὴν εὐδοκίας in 4 : 18). Both of these names occur in the inscriptions.

² Cf. Ferrero, "The Women of the Cæsars" and his "Characters and Events of Roman History."

But these good women need help and Paul intercedes with some one to do this delicate piece of work. The work of peacemaker has a high reward (Matt. 5:9) and is like the work of God in Christ (Eph. 2:14). "Yea, I beseech thee also, true yoke-fellow."² Paul introduces "a third party" (Vincent). Who is this third party? The suggestions are numerous. Epaphroditus, the bearer of the letter, is considered most probable by Lightfoot. Ellicott thinks it is the chief bishop of Philippi. Clement of Alexandria thinks it is Paul's own wife³ who is addressed as "true yoke-fellow." Others have guessed Luke, Silas, Timothy, and even Christ. It is most likely that

¹ παρακαλῶ. It means to call to one's side. The Vulgate has Evodiam rogo, et Syntychen deprecor, a needless distinction in the verbs.

² καὶ ἐρωτῶ καὶ σέ, γνήσιε σύνζυγε. For καὶ see Matt. 15:27; Rom. 3:29. Ἐρωτῶ like rogo is used of equals and αἰτῶ like peto towards a superior. The Vulgate has germane compar.

³ But γνήσιε is masculine.

Syzygus is a proper name and that "true"¹ is a reference to the meaning of "yoke-fellow." Live up to your name, a joiner together. The name does not occur in known inscriptions, but Zygos is found as a Jewish name. At any rate "help these women."² "Take hold together with them." The implication clearly is that Euodia and Syntyche wanted to lay aside their differences, but found it somewhat embarrassing to make a start. Take hold of the problem and help them to solve it. Speak the first word towards peace. Be a peacemaker, not a peace-breaker. Much of the best work that we do is in helping others to agree. It is always a noble thing to help the women, "for they laboured with me in the gospel."³ These women were spiritual athletes,⁴ better than the Amazons of story, along with Paul. The ministry of women is a prominent feature of early Christian work as is plain in the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. It is not made clear precisely what these women did, but their activity is unquestionable. Indeed, to-day too many men are willing for the women to do it all. They say "Ladies first" at the wrong

¹ γνήσιε genuine, true to the name σύνζυγε. For a similar play on the name see Philemon 11 and 12 (ὀνόσιμον, εὖχρηστον, ἄχρηστον). See P. Epph. 63 B. C. 311-310 for γυναῖκα γνήσιαν for "legal wife," "genuine wife."

² συναμβάνου αὐταῖς. Literally, "help them." Note middle voice.

³ αἵτινες ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ συνήθλησάν μοι. Causal use of αἵτινες. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 960. Cf. Phil. 3:7.

⁴ συνήθλησαν. Cf. 1:27.

time. Here Clement and "the rest of my fellow-workers"¹ come after the women. We do not know who these fellow-workers were, "whose names are in the book of life."² Possibly these workers are dead when Paul writes. Paul is always grateful for his co-labourers.

3. Gladness (verse 4).

Here we have again the key-note of the Epistle. Over and over Paul strikes this note of joy. Recently I read an article on "The Joyous Life" in a physical culture magazine. The writer was pleading for a more outspoken manifestation of good-will and hilarity, a rather coarse and boisterous view of happiness. Paul knew the joyous life, the mood of cheerfulness, the serenity and calmness of spirit possible only to the soul stayed on God. So he strikes this refrain: "Rejoice in the Lord always."³ There is no other ground of perpetual optimism that is not blind indifference. Only "in the Lord" is it possible to get a view of life as a whole that will stand the shock of sorrow and sin. Paul knows that he has said "always" and that this word covers the darker side of human life. So he says it over again, after pausing in contemplation of sorrow, "Again I will say, Rejoice."⁴ This philosophy of life is no ephemeral emotion, but a settled principle, a deeper feeling that

¹ τῶν λοιπῶν συνεργῶν μου. Cf. 2: 25.

² ὧν τὰ ὀνόματα ἐν βίβλῳ ζωῆς. This is an Old Testament figure. Cf. Ex. 32: 32; Isa. 4: 3; Ezek. 13: 9.

³ χαίρετε, ἐν κυρίῳ πάντοτε.

⁴ πάλιν ἐρῶ, χαίρετε.

underlies all the storm-tossed waves on the surface. Paul's joy is not grounded in earthly conditions, but in Christ. No one can rob Paul of Christ or of his joy in Christ. Christ satisfies Paul's soul. Christ is his all and in all. He needs naught else to make his soul sing aloud for sheer joy, to sing aloud and to sing long. Men differ in their opinion as to the sweetest song-bird. Some say the nightingale, some the mocking-bird, some the English skylark, some the Kentucky cardinal, some the wood-robin. Each bird has his individual note, but each has the note of joy. Christians have not risen to their privileges in the matter of conquering joy. It is resistless as a witness for Christ and as an antidote for grief.

4. Gentleness (verse 5).

Joy and graciousness go together. "Let your forbearance (gentleness, margin of R. V.) be known unto all men."¹ The word for forbearance and gentleness is translated in various ways as moderation (A. V.),²

¹ τὸ ἐπεικὲς ὁμῶν γνωσθήτω πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις. The neuter adjective with article τὸ ἐπεικὲς is used as abstract quality like ἐπεικεία. Cf. τὸ χρηστὸν (Rom. 2 : 4) and τὸ μωρὸν (1 Cor. 1 : 25). See Robertson, "Grammar," p. 654.

² Cf. Modestia of the Vulgate. Aristotle (Nich. Eth. V. 10) contrasts the word with ἀκριβοδίκαιος judging severely. In 1 Pet. 2 : 18 and Jas. 3 : 17 it is connected with ἀγαθός and εὐπειθής, in 1 Tim. 3 : 3 and Tit. 3 : 2 with ἄμαχος, in 2 Cor. 10 : 1 with πραΰτης. The word is from εἰκός reasonable, fitting, likely, equitable, fair, mild, gentle. The stem of εἰκα is εἴκω the same as εἴκω to yield, concede, though they are not associated by the lexicons. The fundamental ideas are similar.

reasonableness (Kennedy), "sweet reasonableness" (Matthew Arnold, "Literature and Dogma," pp. 66, 138). Courtesy is not far from the true idea. It is graciousness with strength and poise of character. It is the opposite of obstinacy. The word is not negative¹ restraint simply, but positive giving up to the reasonable desires of others. It is the mildness of disposition that leads one to be fair and to go beyond the letter of the law. The best type of the ancients prided themselves on this trait of moderation. Christianity carried it much further and gave a touch that was not there before, the grace of giving up to the weaker. Kennedy pertinently quotes from Pater's "Marius the Epicurean," (ii., p. 120): "As if by way of a due recognition of some immeasurable Divine condescension manifest in a certain historic fact, its influence was felt more especially at those points which demanded some sacrifice of one's self, for the weak, for the aged, for little children, and even for the dead. And then, for its constant outward token, its significant manner or index, it issued in a certain debonair grace, and a certain mystic attractiveness or courtesy, which made Marius doubt whether that famed Greek blitheness or gaiety or grace in the handling of life had been, after all, an unrivalled success." In a word, what Paul here urges is the grace of giving up, not because one has to surrender to superior force, but because of the nobler impulses of generosity and gentleness. Ignatius¹ has it when he pleads: "Let us be found their brothers by our forbearance." It includes the chivalry of the true man towards a woman, his own sister or mother or wife, or any one's sister or mother or wife. A gentleman is a gentle man. "Thy gentleness hath made me great" (2 Sam. 22: 36), said David of God's dealings with him. The great illustration is the example of Jesus. "Now I Paul myself entreat you by the meekness and gentleness² of Christ, I who in your presence am lowly among you, but being absent am of good courage towards you" (2 Cor. 10: 1). The gentleness of Jesus appeals to us to be gentle also, not only to Christians, but to all so far as we can.

¹ Like ἀνοχῇ (from ἀνέχω, hold back).

"The Lord is at hand,"³ Paul adds. The phrase can mean that "The Lord is near" in space as in Psalm 145: 18. "The Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him."⁴ But it is more likely that (cf. Rom. 13: 12; Jas. 5: 8) Paul here means Christ by Lord as he usually does and is referring to the expected return of the Lord Jesus. Indeed, this expression was a sort of watchword with Paul (Lightfoot), a password for the elect. Cf. the Aramaic "Marana tha"⁵ or "O Lord, come" (1 Cor. 16: 22). The

¹ Eph. X ἀδελφοὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἐνδοθῶμεν τῇ ἐπιεικείᾳ.

² διὰ τῆς πραύτητος καὶ ἐπιεικειᾶς τοῦ Χριστοῦ.

³ ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς.

⁴ ἐγγὺς Κύριος πᾶσι τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις αὐτόν.

⁵ Μαράνὰ θά or Μαράν ἀθά "The Lord will come" or "The Lord is here."

manner of Christ is a reason for repose of spirit (see next verses) and for gentleness towards others. The clause here is taken by some with verse 5, by some with verse 6, by some with both. It is true of the continued presence of Jesus with us by the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28 : 20) as well as of the blessed hope of His second coming. "Lo, I am with you all the days, even unto the consummation of the age." Jesus is coming again, but Jesus is also here and near us all the varied days of our checkered human life, here to cheer us and to beckon us on to follow in His steps.

5. The Heart at Rest (verses 6 f.).

Paul has risen to the pure empyrean of spiritual repose above carking cares. He soars like the eagle above the storms below. "In nothing be anxious."¹ It is a common word in the Gospels for harassing care that Paul here uses (cf. Matt. 6 : 25). It suggests brooding and pondering into which our human nature so easily falls (1 Pet. 5 : 7). It is the anxious solicitude² that one finds hard to avoid in time of real trouble as well as "the little foxes that eat away the vine." Christ is the only cure for anxiety of heart. He can calm the fluttering heart that palpitates with worry and dread (cf. John 14 : 1, "Let not your heart be troubled"). Christ's panacea for heart trouble is trust in Him as in God. Paul suggests prayer to God. At bottom the solution is the same. "Let your requests be made known unto God."¹ Come into the presence of² God and open your heart to Him just as if God did not know all about it. The mother loves to have the sobbing child tell all the trouble to her. She understands and the child is sure of sympathy and help. The difficulties will be smoothed out in mother's arms. God loves to hear the tale of our woes "by prayer and supplication."³ It should be in the spirit of gratitude. "Thanksgiving is the background, the predominant tone of the Christian life" (Kennedy). We are to pray "with thanksgiving."⁴ This is an essential element, for dissatisfaction with God will "clip the wings of prayer" (Kennedy). "Remembrance and supplication are the two necessary elements of every Christian prayer" (Rilliet). "Thankfulness for past blessings is a necessary condition of acceptance in preferring new petitions" (Lightfoot). We are to make known our requests to God "in everything."⁵ We are not to pick our ground too sharply, but to have whole-hearted abandonment to the will of God in every ¹ τὰ αἰτήματα ὑμῶν γνωρίζεσθω πρὸς τὸν Θεόν. Vulgate has petitiones.

¹ μηδὲν μεριμνᾶτε. Cf. Homeric μερμηρίζειν to debate anxiously.

² Vulgate has nihil solliciti sitis.

² πρὸς face to face with.

³ τῇ προσευχῇ καὶ τῇ δεήσει. The general term for prayer and the particular word for petition.

⁴ μετ' εὐχαριστίας. Cf. our word Eucharist.

⁵ ἐν παντί.

situation. We are to know that all things work together for our good (Rom. 8 : 28), whether we can perceive it in this particular instance or not.

"And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." The blessing here offered is the result¹ of the attitude of prayer in verse 6. God is the God of peace (Phil. 4 : 9) and His peace² is the inward peace of the soul that is grounded in God's presence and promise (Vincent). Paul here assumes that we have made our peace with God in Christ and now we are enjoying our peace with God (Rom. 5 : 1). This pax Dei is the tranquillity possible only to the soul that has found rest in the bosom of Christ. "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11 : 28). "This peace is like some magic mirror, by the dimness growing on which we may discern the breath of an unclean spirit that would work us ill" (Rendel Harris, "Memoranda Sacra," p. 130). This inward peace fills the heart "with all joy and peace in believing" (Rom. 15 : 13); "for the Kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 14 : 17). This peace of God "passes all understanding."³ Like a granite peak it rises sheer above the mists and clouds of human speculation. Intellectual apprehension fails to grasp the height of it. The intellect is a noble gift and is to be honoured and used, but it is not infallible and at best is a feeble instrument of knowledge. The emotions and the will are more fundamental and more reliable. I stand by the rights of the intellect in criticism and in life. We are bound to do so or to abdicate the throne of reason. But, after all is said and done, the intellect is like a bird with a broken wing. Faith can fly farther and faster and more surely. We must learn to trust the primal instincts as well as the reason. The peace of God rises above the sphere of intellect (sensum, Vulgate). This peace of God shall act as a garrison¹ to the soul. This is a promise, not a prayer (Vincent). It is a military term. Hicks ("Classical Review," 1., pp. 7 f., suggests the garrisoning of the towns by the Roman soldiers as a familiar sight. The successors of Alexander the Great made a feature of such garrisons in the towns of Asia Minor. Philippi was a Roman colony and a military outpost.

¹ καὶ is here consecutive = "and so" or inferential = "then." Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1183.

² ἡ εἰρήνη τοῦ θεοῦ.

³ ἡ ὑπερέχουσα πάντα νοῦν. Intellectual grasp (νοῦς). ὑπερέχω is to overtop, to surpass. Cf. 2 : 3 ; 3 : 8.

"Love is and was my King and Lord,
And will be, though as yet I keep Within his court on earth, and sleep
Encompassed by his faithful guard,

¹ φρουρήσει. Vg. custodiat. Cf. 1 Pet. 1:5 τοὺς ἐν δυνάμει θεοῦ φρουρουμένους.

And hear at times a sentinel
Who moves about from place to place,
And whispers to the worlds of space,
In the deep night that all is well."

—Tennyson.

So the sentinel of God's peace mounts guard over our hearts and thoughts. One recalls the comfort of the voice of the sentinel who walks the bridge of the ship at night in time of storm and calls out that all is well. The little child is sometimes unable to sleep without the pressure of mother's hand and the soothing melody of mother's voice. This peace of God quiets both our hearts and our thoughts. When insomnia comes, the mind is abnormally active and the brain whirls round and round. When fear grips the heart, rest is gone. Both heart and thoughts are soothed to calm and rest as Jesus stilled the sea of Galilee in spite of wind and storm. Beautiful tranquillity comes to him whose soul rests in Christ Jesus for the peace of God keeps watch over his life.

6. High Thinking (verse 8).

Paul is now thinking of the close of the Epistle. "Finally, brethren,"¹ he says, but with no reference to 3:1 where he used similar language. It is not a second finally in the strict sense, though Lightfoot says that once more the Apostle attempts to conclude. Paul thus introduces a noble exhortation to the highest ideals of thought and endeavour. It is a final recapitulation of themes for meditation and practice (Ellicott). The Stoics had their four cardinal virtues (prudence, temperance, justice, fortitude). We are not to think that Paul is here giving a list of Christian virtues on a par with these. In truth, he attempts no inclusive list of spiritual ideals, but gives in rapid fashion two groups, one introduced by "whatsoever,"¹ the other by "if."² Lightfoot sees a descending scale in the words. Perhaps so, and the two "if" clauses may be an afterthought. The list is rather too beautiful for one to enjoy minute dissection. We may pause a moment on each of the words. "True"³ is to be taken in the widest sense, far more than simply veracious. "God is the norm of truth" (Vincent) and Jesus is the truth (John 14:6). The moral ideal of Christianity rests on reality and aims at reality as it answers to the nature of God. Truth is the very core of Christ's teaching. It is no mere value judgment. "Honourable"⁴ is more exactly venerable or reverend or "nobly serious" (Matthew Arnold⁵) as opposed to that flippancy that lacks "intellectual seriousness." Reverence is a sadly needed virtue in many quarters to-day. "Just"⁶

¹ τὸ λοιπόν, ἀδελφοί.

¹ ὅσα. Quaecunque.

² εἴ τις. Si qua.

³ ἀληθῆ. Vera.

⁴ σεμνά. From σέβομαι to worship. Vg. pudica. Opposed to κοῦφος lightness.

⁵ "God and the Bible," Preface XXII.

⁶ δίκαια. From δίκη. Vg. justa.

or righteous is applied to both God and man. It is the right way of looking at things, right per se (cf. Rom. 2:13), according to God's standard. These three qualities are fundamental in Christian ideals, the deep down things that go to the roots of right living. "Pure"¹ is stainless, chaste, unsullied as a pure virgin. "Lovely"² is whatever calls forth love, attracts to itself, the graciousness that wins and charms. Cf. the Beauty of Holiness in the Psalms and the Beautiful and the Good of the Greeks. "Of good report"³ is "fair-sounding" (Vincent), almost our "high-toned"⁴ (Kennedy). Whatever rings true to the previous notes is not out of tune with the Christian standard of morality. There are ever new and changing questions that have to be tested by the Christian's spiritual tuning-fork. The piano must be kept in tune. So must our sensitive spiritual nature be kept clean and sweet. "Virtue"⁵ is moral excellence, a common heathen term that Paul seems generally to avoid (Lightfoot). The word originally meant only courage or manly skill or excellence with no moral quality. It gradually came to be used in a variety of ways.⁶ Peter uses it of

¹ ἁγνά. Vg. sancta. ἅγιος is holy, consecrated, but ἁγνός is pure, untouched of evil, undefiled.

² προσφιλή. Vg. amabilia. Alone here in the New Testament. Cf. Sir. 4:7; 20:13.

³ εὐφημα. Vg. bonæ famæ.

⁴ "Was einen guten Klang hat" (Lipsius).

⁵ ἀρετή. Virtus (Vg.).

⁶ Cf. Deissmann, "Bible Studies," pp. 90 ff.

God (1 Pet. 2:9; 2 Pet. 1:3) and treats it as a Christian grace (2 Pet. 1:4). Paul says: "Quit you like men,¹ be strong" (1 Cor. 16:13). Christianity does appeal to the elemental virtues in young manhood (cf. 1 John 2:13 f.), the sense of the heroic, the nobility of service for others. It has taken over this heathen virtue and applied it to a higher cause. "Praise"² is the moral approbation from the practice of virtue (cf. 1 Cor. 13). Put your mind³ on these things just mentioned. It is not the mere flash of thought like the flitting of a sparrow, but deliberate and prolonged contemplation as if one is weighing a mathematical problem. Reckon up the pros and cons of the moral values in life. Too many fail just here. They do not give Christ worthy consideration. Make your mind move in the realm of elevated thoughts. High thinking is essential to holy living. We must let Christ control our thoughts, "casting down imaginations and every high thing that is exalted against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5).

7. High Endeavour (verse 9).

"These do."⁴ These practice as a habit. These put into practice and keep on doing them. Noble

¹ ἀνδρίζεσθε.

² ἑπαυγος. Vg. laus disciplinæ.

³ λογίζεσθε. Vg. cogitate. Present (linear action) tense.

⁴ ταῦτα πράσσετε. Linear present. Sometimes distinguished from ποιεῖν to accomplish. Vg. haec agite.

ideals will come to naught unless translated into deeds. Performance surpasses mere preaching. The physician must practice his theories and heal himself. So Paul turns from generalities to particulars.¹ Paul has given above proper subjects for meditation. He now presents a proper line of action (Lightfoot). It is now a scheme of duties (Vincent), not a list of mottoes. It is not necessary to say with Ellicott that Paul has precisely the same ideas in mind in verse 9 as in verse 8, but certainly the general outline is the same. Paul urges that the Philippians transmute aspiration into actuality, profession into performance. He even claims that he has given them a suitable example for their imitation. The exponents of so-called "New Thought" at least have grasped the truth of the relation between thought and life. Paul was a practical idealist, a pragmatist in the best sense of that term. He gave them proper precepts similar to the list in verse 8: "The things which ye both learned and received."² They had taken their lesson well from Paul as the transmitter. Paul had also given them the concrete expression of abstract truth: "and heard and saw in me."³ They knew his life among them which was an open book to them. This is the Bible that the world eagerly reads, the epistle that is known and read of all men, the life of Christ in God's people. There is no escape from it. Paul humbly points to his life in Christ as an aid to the Philippians in following after the great ideals set before them, "And the God of peace shall be with you."¹ This is proper preparedness to make peace with God by surrender to His will and then to find peace and power in God through Christ.

¹ "Facit transitionem a generalibus ad Paulina" (Bengel).

² ἃ καὶ ἐμάθετε καὶ παρελάβετε. Vg. quæ et didicistis, et accepistis.

³ καὶ ἠκούσατε καὶ εἶδετε ἐν ἐμοί. Vg. et audistis, et vidistis in me.

¹ καὶ ὁ θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης ἔσται μεθ' ὑμῶν. Vg. Deus pacis erit vobiscum. For this phrase (God of peace) see also Rom. 15 : 33 ; 16 : 20 ; 1 Thess. 5 : 23 ; Heb. 13 : 20.

XI

THE SECRET OF HAPPINESS

(4 : 10-23)

THIS Epistle is not long, but it is very rich in thought and fertile in suggestion. There seems little order save the introduction, the body of the Epistle, and the close, but Paul has an orderly method in his own mind in spite of the apparently easy and incidental way in which he goes on his way.

1. Delicate Appreciation (verse 10).

"But I rejoice in the Lord greatly,"¹ Paul adds with no apology for his repeated expression of joy in the Lord, great² joy this time, "that now at length ye have revived your thought for me."³ Paul had indeed alluded to the generosity of the Philippians in the gift which Epaphroditus had brought (1 : 5, 7 ; 2 : 30), but he had not formally thanked them for their kindness. He seemed about to forget it in his eager discussion of other things and so he checked himself before it was too late. They had sent the gift in the Lord and he had received it in the Lord and he now is grateful in the Lord. Kennedy thinks that Paul here discusses his attitude towards the gift of the Philippians because of the base slanders about him elsewhere. The "cloak of covetousness" was a phrase flung at him in Thessalonica that stuck and hurt this proud and sensitive man (1 Thess. 2:5). It is an old canard that preachers preach for money. If so, very few ever get the object of their ambition. Paul defended his right to full pay for his preaching (1 Cor. 9:3-18; Gal. 6:6), but because of the foolish misrepresentations of his work in Corinth he made the gospel message there without charge. Some even criticized him for this refusal to receive pay, but Paul continued to preach the Gospel for naught in Corinth to cut off occasion from those who desire occasion (2 Cor. 11:8-12). He even "robbed other churches" to do this thing. But even so he did not escape, for he was accused of using Titus to raise a fund for himself under pretense of getting money for the poor saints in Jerusalem (2 Cor. 12:16-18). It is a humiliating experience for a preacher to have to make public appeal for his own support. Paul refused to stoop to that level and worked with his own hands (1 Thess. 2:9; Acts 20:33f.) in order to be independent of those who were so ready to impute wrong motives to him. He rejoiced in the church at Philippi because they trusted him and understood him. They gladly and frequently made contributions for the support of his work elsewhere. For some time the Philippians had not remembered Paul in this way. He had been a prisoner in Cæsarea for over two years. Then came the voyage and shipwreck and the imprisonment in Rome. A considerable interval had elapsed since the last time (cf. 2 Cor. 11 : 9) before Epaphroditus came. It has seemed long ("now at length") to Paul as he looked back over it all. The coming of Epaphroditus seemed like a genuine revival of interest on the part of the Philippians. It was like old times to hear from them again in this way. "Ye let your thought of me sprout up¹ now once again" like a plant in spring (the miracle of spring!). Their thought of Paul had blossomed again like the first crocuses of spring. Like a bunch of roses their gift spoke volumes. It was sweet to Paul to be remembered again by his old friends in his hour of trial. People sometimes take the pastor too much as a matter of course. It did my soul good one day to hear a deacon say of his pastor : "He is worth his weight in gold." I told the pastor what the deacon had said and it cheered him greatly.

¹ ἐχάρην δὲ ἐν κυρίῳ μεγάλως. The epistolary aorist (Robertson, "Grammar," p. 845). "The δὲ arrests a subject which is in danger of escaping" (Lightfoot).

² Polycarp ad Phil. i. has συνεχάρην ὑμῖν μεγάλως ἐν Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

³ ὅτι ἤδη ποτὲ ἀνεθάλετε τὸ ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ φρονεῖν.

But Paul's delicate nature shrinks from the implication that they had really forgotten him. "Wherein ye did indeed take thought, but ye lacked opportunity."¹ Paul's sensitive concern makes him withdraw the implied rebuke for their apparent neglect. They may not have known always where he was or they may have had no messenger till Epaphroditus came. The word for "lacked opportunity" could mean "lacked means." Expression of thanks is often embarrassing, but Paul keeps his poise and misses the pitfalls.

¹ ἀνεθάλετε. Rare second aorist form and probably transitive as in Ezek. 17 : 24. Ingressive aorist.

2. Manly Independence (verses 11^a, 17^a).

Paul is not free from fear about being misunderstood on the subject of money. It is in truth a thorny problem. He has set straight his appreciation of the continued interest and love of the Philippians. But he shrinks again from the fear that they will think that he is hinting for future favours. "Not that I speak in respect of want."² He repeats the same caveat in verse 17^a: "Not that I seek for the gift."³ Paul does not wish his joy at this fresh proof of their love to be understood as mere satisfaction at relief from want or begging for a repetition of like generosity. He is not suggesting that they do it again. Many another preacher has had similar emotions as he expresses appreciation of the kindnesses received at the hands of friends. Paul is sensitive on the point of his financial independence. He vindicated his right to adequate remuneration for his work in Corinth, as we have seen (1 Cor. 9 : 6-20), but all the same he would not allow them to pay him because of their suspicion and perversion of his conduct. So he toiled on at his trade of tent-making and supported himself in the main, though he did accept the gifts from the Philippians. Many of the pioneer American preachers were confronted with precisely this situation. In order to preach at all they had to support themselves. Usually the pioneer preacher had a farm. Sometimes he was a merchant, a lawyer, or a physician. All honour to the courageous men who met abnormal conditions and knew how to preach Christ in spite of ignorance and prejudice. We are not yet past this mistreatment of preachers who are paid in most cases a pitiful salary and are not allowed to splice it out by secular business. If preachers do not live well on a pittance, they are considered poor business men. If they do make some money, they are charged with being fond of filthy lucre, as, alas, is sometimes true. But the modern minister must keep out of debt, pay his bills promptly, make a good appearance and so dress well, entertain largely, educate his children, lead his church in beneficence, and save some money for old age when no church wants his services. It is a vicious circle and leads too often to debt and loss of financial standing and almost of self-respect. The whole business cheapens the preacher. Paul felt it all keenly. It rankled in his breast. He would be manly and self-reliant. He would be independent and stand on his own feet. It is openly charged to-day against the ministry that they are often afraid to speak out against crying evils (like the liquor business, the divorce evil, the wrongs done to labouring men), because the preacher's salary is largely paid by men guilty of some of these social sins. It is probably sometimes true, but the great mass of modern preachers are loyal to their ideals and risk all for their message. Pay the preacher a decent salary.

¹ ἐφ' ᾧ καὶ ἐφρονεῖτε, ἡκαιρεῖσθε δέ. The imperfects picture the state of mind of the Philippians. Liddell and Scott give only one instance (Diod. Siculus) of ἀκαιρέω. Moulton & Milligan's "Vocabulary" gives no instance in the papyri and inscriptions, but does give ἀκαίρως and ἀκαιρία. Εὐκαιρέω in sense of favourable opportunity occurs in the papyri.

² ὅχ' ὅτι καὶ ὁστέρησιν λέγω. Cf. 3 : 12 for similar use of ὅχ' ὅτι to guard against misapprehension. The Vg. has non quasi propter penuriam dico.

³ ὅχ' ὅτι ἐπιζητῶ τὸ δόμα. Note the force of ἐπί.

3. Learning the Secret (verses 11^b, 12).

The ministry has its limitations. They are the limits of efficiency and service also. It is no life of self-indulgent affluence. Many things must be given up. Happy is the man who learns this lesson soon. Paul had learned the joy of doing without. "For I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content."¹ Paul had to learn it for himself² as we all do. He still knows³ his lesson.

¹ ἐγὼ γὰρ ἔμαθον ἐν οἷς εἰμὶ ἀνταρξῆς εἶναι.

² Note emphasis of ἐγὼ γὰρ.

³ ἔμαθον is aorist indicative, but a timeless aorist. It is the constative aorist and sums up all the life of Paul as one experience. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 831-834.

"The tuition has extended over his whole experience up to the present" (Vincent). It is now his blessed possession and helps to explain his sense of manly independence. One can be too complacent for any use and lack ambition. One can be content only when he has reached the goal of his desires. Happy is the man who keeps the golden mean, who is not slothful, who is not resentful. There is a holy discontent. The Stoics made a good deal out of the virtue of self-sufficiency or independence of external circumstances.¹ They held that a man should be sufficient in and unto himself in all things. When asked who was the wealthiest, Socrates said: "He who is content with least, for self-sufficiency is nature's wealth" (Stob. Flor. v. 43). Plato (Tim. 33 D) held that a being who was self-sufficient was far superior to one that lacked anything.² But, though Paul uses the Stoic word, he has more than the Stoic idea. He expressly disclaims this mere self-sufficiency: "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, to account anything as from ourselves; but our sufficiency is from God" (2 Cor. 3:5). "And

¹ This is the true meaning of αὐτάρκης (αὐτός and ἄρκειω). So Marcus Aurelius i. 16 τὸ αὐτάρκης ἐν παντί. Seneca to Gallio De Vita Beata 6 Beatus est præsentiis, quæliacunque sunt, contentus.

² Cf. also Repub. 369 B. The papyri naturally give no examples of this philosophic use of αὐτάρκης. Sharp quotes Epictetus ("Epictetus and the New Testament," p. 124): "Rejoice in what you have and be content (ἁγάπα) with those things for which it is the season."

God is able to make all grace abound unto you; that ye, having always all sufficiency in everything, may abound unto every good work" (2 Cor. 9: 8). Paul's sufficiency is in Christ (Phil. 4: 13) who makes a new self out of the old. Christ in Paul is the secret. It is godliness with contentment that is great gain (1 Tim. 6: 6) over Stoicism and the so-called Christian Science of to-day which ignores and denies the facts of life. Paul is fully aware of the state in which he is, but he has learned how to rise above circumstance and environment and to be superior to these external matters. It is easy enough to be content somewhere else and in a different set of circumstances. But, caught in the net of evil chance, what is one to do, driven on by the Sturm und Drang of things? The problem with us all is precisely how to find content in the midst of things that ought to be changed. We should change what ought to be changed and can be changed for the better. What cannot be cured has to be endured. Do it with a smiling face. This is the lesson learned by Paul. This is the secret of a happy life. Kennedy quotes Boswell's "Johnson" (Globe ed., p. 351): "Dr. Johnson talked with approbation of one who had attained to the state of the philosophical wise man, that is, to have no want of anything. 'Then, sir,' said I, 'the savage is a wise man.' 'Sir,' said he, 'I do not mean simply being without,—but not having a want.'"

"I know how to be abased, and I know also how to abound.”¹ Some people can stand adversity who are ruined by prosperity. Poverty imposes a certain restraint that is swept away by the flood-tide of riches. Some are happy with plenty and grow bitter in spirit when want knocks at the door. Some wealthy men give most of their money away in order to save their sons from the peril of money. The discipline of life is worth more than ease to make a man that is worth while. “Give me neither poverty nor riches.” Yes, but life does not flow in such a placid stream as that. Drouth follows flood. The Nile runs low (Diod. i. 36) and the water has to be conserved by irrigation now as of old. One must learn how to endure either famine or plenty, the lean years and the fat. The pendulum swings back and forth. Poise of character must keep us steady when either extreme comes. “Or did I commit a sin in abasing myself that ye might be exalted?” Paul asks the Corinthians with keen irony (2 Cor. 11:7).²

“In everything and in all things have I learned the secret.”³ Paul uses the particular and the general in an effort to cover completely the whole of life’s varied experiences. “In every way have we made

¹ οἶδα καὶ ταπεινοῦσθαι, οἶδα καὶ περισσεύειν. “The one καὶ must be correlative to the other” (Kennedy). Cf. Robertson, “Grammar,” pp. 1180 f.

² Here ὑποῦν is the antithesis of ταπεινοῦν as is usual, but in Phil. 4:12 it is περισσεύειν.

³ ἐν παντὶ καὶ ἐν πᾶσι μεμύημαι. In Allem und Jedem. Vg. wrongly translates ubique et in omnibus institutus sum.

this manifest unto you in all things" (2 Cor. 11 : 6). The word for learning the secret¹ here means "I have been initiated" or "I possess the secret." It was used of initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries.² Our very word mystery³ is this Greek word. The Mithraists also used it for their secret rites. Paul takes the word and employs it of the mystic initiation into the life in Christ which makes him superior to all the accidents that come and go. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him" (Ps. 25 : 14). The wisdom of Solomon (8 : 4) speaks of our being initiated into the knowledge of God.⁴ Ignatius⁵ speaks of those who are "co-mystics with Paul the sanctified." The initiate kept his secret. Paul gloried in the mystery of God (Christ) in whom all the treasures of knowledge are hidden (Col. 2 : 2 f.; cf. also 1 : 26 f.). The baptized Christian came to be called the initiated one. Paul had his initiation into the mystery of happiness in the ups and downs of his life for Christ in the Roman world. "Both to be filled and to be hungry,"⁶ says Paul, both to have plenty like a horse with plenty of fodder or grass and to be hungry with no grass at all. "Both to

¹ μεμύημαι from μύω to close or shut (cf. mutus, mute) is the present perfect passive.

² Cf. Herod. ii. 51 ; Plato, Gorg. 497 C. ; Aristoph. Plut. 846 ; Plut. Mor. p. 795 E.

³ μυστήριον.

⁴ μύστις γάρ ἐστιν τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ ἐπιστήμης.

⁵ Ep̄h. XII. Παύλου συμμύσται τοῦ ἡγιασμένου.

⁶ καὶ χορτάζεσθαι καὶ πεινᾶν.

abound and to be in want,"¹ he concludes, both to overflow like a river and be dry like a desert. Alas, how familiar the second word is to many preachers who know what it is to be behind in one's accounts with nothing in the bank to draw on. To be in want and have no way to supply the necessary demands of life is a tragedy. One can see the pretty things in the stores and pass them by, the new books in the shops and let them go. But it is hard to see one's own family suffer for food and raiment and fuel. Paul had learned how to do without many things, not even to want them, and yet to be happy. He had all in Christ and abounded.

4. Paul's Dynamo (verse 13).

In dodging this and that misapprehension Paul has avowed his independence of material comforts. It is not a new attitude for Paul: He has long come to feel that the unseen, not the seen, is the proper goal of endeavour (2 Cor. 4:17 f.). "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me."² Paul feels able not only to do what he had said in verse 12, but also to meet all demands of a similar nature. It is sublime egotism surely. But is that all? Is it true? "I have strength for all things,"³ he means. This strength resides in¹ Christ who furnishes the power for the exercise of this spiritual prowess. Christ "empowers"² Paul, surcharges him with energy. Christ is Paul's dynamo potential and actual. Christ "infuses strength" (Vincent) into Paul and hence he has it in all abundance. Paul uses this great word elsewhere also of Christ's relation to him. "I thank him that enabled³ me, Christ Jesus our Lord" (1 Tim. 1:12). "But the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me"⁴ (2 Tim. 4:17). Paul has spiritual power for life because Christ is his life. "Be strong in the Lord"⁵ (Eph. 6:10). This power is accessible to all who will yield themselves to Christ, who unreservedly place themselves at the service of Jesus, who make the full surrender to God. So then it is not an idle boast that Paul is making. It is no boast at all. He does not mean that he always has his way. Far from it. He has learned to do without his way and to find his joy in God's way so that no one can rob him of this joy in Christ. Men can kill him, but they cannot deprive him of the love and the power of Christ in his life (Rom. 8:35-39). Paul leads the victorious life because he lets Christ reign and rule in his heart. The power of Christ in Paul is not for the gratification of Paul's whims, but for

¹ καὶ περισσεύειν καὶ ὑστερεῖσθαι.

² πάντα ἰσχύω ἐν τῷ ἐνδυναμοῦντί με. Vg. has Omnia possum in eo, qui me confortat.

³ Cf. Jas. 5:16. πολλὸν ἰσχύει. Cf. also Gal. 5:6. The accusative is due to the verb and is not adverbial. Δύναμις is manifested in ἰσχύς.

¹ ἐν here is more than the so-called instrumental use.

² ἐνδυναμῶ is a rare word. It occurs in Judg. 6:34 (Codex A) πνεῦμα θεοῦ ἐνεδυνάμωσεν τὸν Γεδεὼν.

³ τῷ ἐνδυναμώσαντί με.

⁴ ἐνεδυνάμωσέν με.

⁵ ἐνδυναμοῦσθε ἐν κυρίῳ.

the carrying out of Christ's will. In a real sense therefore the Christian is a reproduction of Christ. A small dynamo can retain its energy if continually replenished. Christians themselves are spiritual dynamos, but they must be in constant touch with the source of life and energy. Ignatius¹ said: "I undergo all things, since he himself strengthens me who is perfect man." The constant inflow of power from Christ allows Paul to be a continuous supply of energy for others.

5. Courteous Thanks (verses 14-18).

Once more Paul catches himself before he creates the impression that he does not really care for the gift of the Philippians. He is independent and self-reliant and able to meet every emergency by the grace and power of Jesus Christ. But this does not mean that he does not suffer privation and affliction. It is not "thankless thanks" as Holsten argues. "Howbeit ye did well that ye had fellowship with my affliction."² The gift was not superfluous for Paul was still a prisoner and in affliction. He as-

¹ Smyrn. IV. πάντα ὑπομένω, αὐτοῦ με ἐνδυναμοῦντος τοῦ τελείου ἀνθρώπου.

² πλὴν καλῶς ἐποιήσατε συνκοινωνήσαντές μου τῇ θλίψει. On πλὴν see 1 : 18 ; 3 : 16. For this idiomatic use of καλῶς and the participle see Acts 10 : 33 ; 2 Pet. 1 : 19 ; 3 John 6. For εἶ see Acts 15 : 29. It is the supplementary participle. Robertson, "Grammar," p. 1121. Hort. on 1 Pet. 2 : 12 says that καλός "denotes that kind of goodness which is at once seen to be good."

served his independence as the rule of his whole life in Christ, not as a reflection on the generosity of the Philippians. So Paul's appreciation is hearty and sincere and not ironical. The Philippians had made common cause¹ with Paul in his long imprisonment and this fact Paul would never forget. They "went shares" with Paul (Lightfoot on Gal. 6:6). Vincent quotes Ben Johnson's use of "communicate" in the old sense of "share," "thousands that communicate our loss."

Paul gives the Philippians their crown of glory as the first of the apostolic churches to rise to the full height of complete coöperation in the missionary enterprise. The church at Jerusalem had a powerful Pharisaic element in it, the Judaizers ("they that were of the circumcision"), who arraigned Peter for preaching to and associating with Cornelius (Acts 11:1-18) and who challenged the missionary propaganda of Paul and Barnabas among the Gentiles (Acts 15:1-35). In Antioch itself Barnabas and Saul won sympathy, but no financial support (Acts 13 and 14), a great advance on Jerusalem. But it was the Philippians who first made contributions to the support of Paul in his great work. "And ye yourselves also know, ye Philippians."² Ye men of

¹ συνκοινωνήσαντες. Paul makes abundant use of compounds with σύν like the κοινή generally, in spite of its rarity as a preposition. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 626ff.

² οἴδατε δὲ καὶ ὑμεῖς, Φιλιππησίου. Cf. 1 Thess. 2:1.

Philippi know this as well as I, Paul explains. It was no secret. "In the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church had fellowship with me in the matter of giving and receiving but ye only."¹ Paul is not apologizing for a disappointment in the later cessation of their gifts, but enlarging the scope of his appreciation. The rather he praises them in that they had opened an account with Paul, a credit and debit page, "in the matter of giving and receiving." This is a common expression for pecuniary transactions (Sir. 41:19; 42:7; Epictetus ii.:9; Hermas Mand. v. 2). The "beginning of the gospel" refers evidently to the early stage of the work in Macedonia about ten years before this letter, not the origin of the gospel work in Palestine. We know precisely then that the Philippians helped Paul while he was in Corinth (cf. 2 Cor. 11:8 f.). But he here shows that even while in Macedonia the church at Philippi had helped Paul. "For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my need."² Paul had left Timothy in Philippi when he and Silas left (Acts 16:40; 17:4), but he was in Berœa with Silas when Paul went on to

¹ ὅτι ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, ὅτε ἐξῆλθον ἀπὸ Μακεδονίας, οὐδεμία μοι ἐκκλησία ἐκοινώνησεν εἰς λόγον δόσεως καὶ λήψεως εἰ μὴ ὑμεῖς μόνοι. The papyri give λόγος in sense of "account" as εἰς λόγον ἱματισμοῦ on account of clothing. P. Oxy. 275²¹ A. D. 66.

² ὅτι καὶ ἐν θεσσαλονίκῃ καὶ ἅπαξ καὶ δις εἰς τὴν χρεῖαν μου ἐπέμψατε. Cf. 1 Thess. 2:18 for ἅπαξ καὶ δις.

Athens (Acts 17:14 f.). Probably Timothy had brought gifts, but even in Thessalonica they had sent contributions more than once. They kept it up after Paul went to Corinth as we have seen (2 Cor. 11:8 f.), though Thessalonica and Berea may now have joined with Philippi in the gifts to Paul since Paul speaks of "other churches" (2 Cor. 11:8). Timothy and Silas may have brought gifts from all these churches when they came to Corinth (cf. Acts 18:5). "Not only on my departure, but even before I departed you were mindful of my necessities" (Vincent).

"Not that I seek for the gift." "Again the Apostle's nervous anxiety to clear himself interposes" (Lightfoot). He is not hinting for more gifts. They must excuse him for saying that again (4:11). "But I seek for the fruit that increaseth to your account."¹ It is not the gift so much as the giving that has brought joy to Paul's heart (Kennedy). A raven could bring a gift as to Elijah. But the real "interest"² on their investment is the spiritual fruit that comes to them. This is the real credit side of the ledger. "It is more blessed to give than to receive" as Jesus said (Acts 20:35). The way to lay up treasure in heaven is to give it away while on earth. "Ye have your fruit unto sanctification, and the end eternal life" (Rom. 6 : 22). It is literally true that we only save what we give. It is also true that without giving we cannot grow in grace as we ought. If the Gospel could be preached to the world free of all cost, it would be a misfortune to the churches for they would be denied this spiritual growth that comes from hearty giving to the Lord's cause.

¹ ἀλλὰ ἐπιζητῶ τὸν καρπὸν τὸν πλεονάζοντα εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν. Cf. 2 Cor. 9:6.

² Chrysostom explains all these terms here by the money-market. He says: ὁ καρπὸς ἐκεῖνός τίκεται.

"But I have all things, and abound."¹ "I have the receipt in full." Deissmann² finds "countless instances" of the verb in the ostraca and papyri in the sense of receipt in full. Paul can give them this receipt in full for their gifts. He overflows with their love. He has more than he could desire. "Who is rich? He that is contented with his lot" (C. Taylor, "Sayings of Jewish Fathers," p. 64). "I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the things from you."³ Paul can stand no more for the present, so bountifully have the Philippians supplied his needs. In giving to Paul they have given unto God, "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing unto God."⁴ Their gift is like the fragrance

¹ ἀπέχω δὲ πάντα καὶ περισσεύω.

² "Light from the Ancient East," p. 110. Like ἀπέχω παρὰ σοῦ τέλες(ος) ἐπιξένου (ostrakon), ἀπέχω παρ' ὑμῶν τὸν φόρον (Fayûm Pap. A. D. 57). Cf. Matt. 6 : 2. It is the aoristic present. Cf. Robertson, "Grammar," pp. 864-870.

³ πεπλήρωμαι δεξάμενος παρὰ Ἐπαφροδίτου τὰ παρ' ὑμῶν. Note tense of πεπλήρωμαι (state of completion), full satisfaction.

⁴ ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας, θυσίαν δεκτὴν, εὐαρεστὸν τῷ θεῷ.

of sweet incense (cf. Eph. 5 : 2). The figure is very common of the sacrifices in the Old Testament (Gen. 8 : 21 ; Ex. 29 : 18). The gift is a spiritual sacrifice. They were not actually buying grace, but they pleased God with this proof of their love and loyalty (cf. Rom. 12 : 1 f. ; Heb. 13 : 16 ; 1 Pet. 2 : 5). Surely Paul has given golden words for the loving tokens from the Philippians.

6. Riches in Glory (verses 19 f.).

Paul adds God's blessing with all his heart and with full confidence. "God's treatment of them corresponds to their treatment of Paul" (Kennedy). "And my God shall supply every need of yours."¹ You have filled my cup to overflowing² (verse 18). God shall fill³ yours to the brim and over. Paul says "my God" because he had tested and tried God as his own Protector and Father. He has not forgotten me, and He will not forget you. There is implied also God's "practical approval" (Vincent) of the conduct of the Philippians towards Paul. But, just as Paul had received his highest blessing in his independence of his environment, so the Philippians will receive blessings from God "according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus."⁴ God has unlimited resources and unbounded love. The measure⁵ of His beneficence is "the riches in glory in Christ Jesus,"

¹ ὁ δὲ θεὸς μου πληρώσει πάντας ὑμῶν.

² πεπληρωμαι.

³ πληρώσει.

⁴ κατὰ τὸ πλοῦτος αὐτοῦ ἐν δόξῃ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. ⁵ κατὰ.

“the unsearchable riches of Christ”¹ (Eph. 3 : 8), the “unspeakable gift”² (2 Cor. 9 : 15). God’s blessing will be both temporal and spiritual, but the weight of glory of the spiritual far surpasses the light affliction of the present (2 Cor. 4 : 17). The Philippians had not done what they did as a matter of spiritual barter with God. Paul does not take it so. The dignity and delicacy of his words here are above all praise. He expresses his own independence without harshness while he exhibits the utmost courtesy and gratitude towards his benefactors for this fresh expression of their love. Blessings on those who have done so many kindnesses to ministers of Christ. They gave the cup of cold water in the name of a disciple and it did not escape the eye of Christ. The preacher has to learn to fix his eye upon the spiritual values in life as his chief reward (2 Cor. 4 : 18). The riches in glory in Christ are the real wealth of the world after all and this treasure is offered to all disciples of Jesus who do the work of Christ in the spirit of Christ. “Now unto our God and Father be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.” This is a suitable doxology. “The glory”³ belongs to God as our Father. Let us freely give it to Him. The word is used in the Septuagint for the glory of the Shekinah or Presence of God. Peter, James, and John saw Jesus bathed in this glory on the mount of transfiguration. Our glory in the end of the day will be to see Jesus crowned King of kings and Lord of lords. That will be glory for us.

¹ τὸ ἀνεξιχνίαστον πλοῦτος τοῦ χριστοῦ.

² τῇ ἀνεκδιηγήτῳ αὐτοῦ δωρεᾷ.

³ ἡ δόξα.

7. Paul's Farewell (verses 21-23).

The time has come for Paul to say good-bye to the Philippians. The Epistle is after all very brief, but rich in thought. He may have written these last words with his own hand (cf. Gal. 6:11; 2 Thess. 3:17). The Epistle was probably read to the whole church. "Salute every saint in Christ."¹ The humblest man or woman who loves Christ has a claim on Paul's love. By "saint," as we have already seen, Paul does not mean the "professional" saint who prates of his piety which nobody else can recognize, nor does he mean the best of the Christians in Philippi. He includes all true disciples of Christ. Saint is the inclusive name for followers of Jesus with the obligation to holiness involved in the name. "The brethren that are with me salute you."² Those Roman Christians who helped Paul in his work³ are here described as well as his personal companions and fellow-travellers. "All the saints salute you."⁴ Here the whole Roman brotherhood is included. "Especially they that are of Cæsar's household."⁵ Cæsar's personal family is not meant,

¹ ἀσπασασθε πάντα ἅγιον ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.

² ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ ἀδελφοί.

³ McGiffert, "Apostolic Age," p. 397.

⁴ ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς πάντες οἱ ἅγιοι.

⁵ μάλιστα δὲ οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας. Vg. maxime autem, qui de Cæsaris domo sunt.

but the great imperial establishment which was very extensive, including slaves, freedmen, household servants, dependents, and retainers of various kinds.¹ Some of the prætorian guard may have been included (Phil. 1 : 13). Many of the emperor's servants came from the east and some of these could very well be Christians (cf. Rom. 16) even before Paul came to Rome and all the more so now. Sanday and Headlam on Romans show that many of the names in Romans 16 occur in the Corpus of Latin Inscriptions as members of the imperial household. Evidently Christ has come near to Cæsar in Rome. Christ is challenging Cæsar in his own home. These Christian slaves can do something to leaven the lump even there. We do not know why Paul puts in "especially." Some of this number may have come originally from Philippi or may have been known to some of the Philippians. "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit."² This is Paul's last word and one of his favourite benedictions (cf. Phile. 25 ; Gal. 6 : 18). Paul's emphasis is on grace, grace from the Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God and Son of man, grace that ennobles and enriches the human spirit as the abode of God's Spirit.

¹ Cf. Lanciani, "Ancient Rome in the Light of Recent Excavations," pp. 128 ff. See also Lightfoot's Comm. on Philippians.

² ἡ Χάρις τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν.

Some Important Books on Philippians

- Alford, The Greek Testament. Vol. II. 1861.
- Baskerville, Side-Lights on the Epistle to the Philippians. 1914.
- Beet, A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, and to Colossians and to Philemon. 1891.
- Bell and Lunsford, Epistle to the Philippians (Sou. Bapt. Conv. Commentaries. 1917.
- Bengel, Gnomon Novi Testamenti. Ed. of Steudel. 1855. Calvin. 1539.
- Chrysostom, Migne's Patrologia. 1863.
- Dibelius, Lietzmann's Handbuch zum Neuen Testament. 1911.
- Drummond, J., International Handbooks to New Testament. 1899.
- Eadie, A Commentary on the Greek Text of the Epistle of Paul to the Philippians. 2d ed. 1884.
- Ellicott, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. 5th ed. 1888.
- Ewald, P., Zahn Kommentar. 1908.
- Gwynn, Speaker's Commentary. 1889.
- Haupt, Meyer Kommentar. 8th ed. 1902.
- Johnstone, The Philippian Gospel or Pauline Ideals. 1904.
- Jowett, J. H., The High Calling. 1909.
- Kennedy, H. A. A., Expositor's Greek Testament. 1903.
- Klöpffer, Der Brief an die Philipper. 1893.
- Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians. 9th ed. 1891.

- Lipsius, Holtzmann's Hand-Commentar. 2d ed. 1893.
 Lumby, Schaff's Popular Commentary. 1882.
 Martin, New Century Bible.
 Moule, Cambridge Greek Testament. 1897.
 Moule, Cambridge Bible for Schools.
 Moule, Philippian Studies. 1897.
 Rainy, Expositor's Bible. 1899.
 Rilliet, Commentaire sur l'Épître de l'Apôtre Paul aux Philippiens. 1841.
 Smith, R. R., The Epistle of St. Paul's First Trial. 1899.
 Soden, H. von, Der Brief des Apostels Paulus an die Phi-lipper. 2d ed. 1906.
 Theodore of Mopsuestia. Ed. of Swete. 1880.
 Vaughan, C. J. 1882.
 Vincent, International Critical Commentary. 1897.
 Weiss, B., Der Philipper-brief ausgesetzt und die Geschichte seiner Auslegung Kritisch dargestellt. 1859.
 Wohlenberg, Strack-Zöckler's Kurzgefasst. Comm. 1895.
 Yorke, The Law of the Spirit.

[illegible]

PRINTED IN U.S.A.

BS2705 .R649
Paul's joy in Christ: studies in

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00013 9941